This book is created from two previous editions.

This is extended edition, amended and supplemented. Here you can learn more about the several mysterious military buildings of the Third Reich.

This little book is devoted to the secret laboratories of Nazi Germany. In this edition, you are waiting for underground laboratories and the first German nuclear weapons research.

The Third Reich concealed many mysteries. We will try to take a closer look at some of them.

Object "Drake" (Bittenstadt, Germany)

March 3, 1945, several residents of Arshtadt, participated in the cleaning of hundreds of mutilated bodies monstrous temperature in terrible positions, scattered in the perimeter of the local branch of the concentration camp, completely destroyed some monstrous explosion...

Well, about everything in order. A participant of the event, Claire Werner (Cläre Werner), as well as many civilians while taking part in the supervisory patrol defense, testified: "It was about 9:30 when I suddenly saw something unbelievable ... it was so bright as hundreds of lightning inside a red and yellow on the outside, it was so light that we could read the newspaper. It all happened very quickly, and we did not have time to see anything. The truth is noticed that the shock wave came shortly ... ". The woman claims that after a while, she began to complain about "nosebleeds, headaches and pressure in the ears," so resembling the symptoms of radiation sickness.

Allegedly by the same Claire Werner, when the next day, when by order of the commandant of "SS", civilians were taken to work, they did not know that would go into a small concentration camp located west Bittshtedt, but when they are instructed to carry the burnt body and disassemble charred huts, a local resident, Heinz Vashmut (Heinz Wachsmut), going up to K.Verner, whispered in her ear: "here have experienced something of what will soon be talking the whole world ..".

This intricate legend about Hitler's atomic bomb, again unexpectedly appeared in March 2005, starting with the publication in the German magazine "Spiegel". According to the authors, everything described in the sensational article is mentioned in the book by Rainer Karlsch, under the title "Hitlers Bombe: Die geheime Geschichte der deutschen Kernwaffenversuche" in which the author adheres to the bold assumption that Hitler's Germany not only successfully crossed its nuclear program, but also conducted a total of three nuclear test explosions.

The intrigue of Karlsch's sensational research, as well as the main "witness" of the storyline in the "study" is Gerhard Rundnagel, who worked (do not be surprised) by the ordinary "civilian" plumber in the Stasi (the secret police of the GDR). I do not know what kind of papers were used in the toilet of this special service, but the ordinary plumber, as it turned out, was aware of all the secrets of the Third Reich, which "dealt" with SHTAZI (Ministerium für Staatssicherheit). How he got into the field of view of the "researcher" Karlsch, I will tell at the end of the article.

So, in general, the graphical plot of this book boils down to several characters already familiar to us: The first one, Dr. Kurt Dibner, is the leader of a group of "military physicists" who, using the idea of Schumann's astrophysicist, found a way to undermine the nuclear charge , start a chain reaction). The first test explosion of the great-grandfather of the nuclear bomb, the German nuclear engineers allegedly carried out on the island of Rügen, in the fall of 1944 (I will tell about this separately), and two others, in March 1945 in Thuringia, in the north of the Oardruf test site. Dr. Dibner - died in 1964, and already nothing will tell anyone.

The second "witness", the plumber from the secret police Gerhard Rudnagel, who had already mentioned me, did not see anything himself, but he knows everything, he told me a whole book. And the third character, this is a certain local resident, Klara Verner, with her own eyes observed "a flash and an explosion that was brighter than a thousand suns." The main subject of the "fantastic novel" of Mr. Karlsch, built on the basis of the last two, to put it mildly, "direct evidence."

Constant readers probably noticed that the name of this witness (Clara Werner) already met somewhere in articles devoted to the secrets of the Third Reich. Yes? Do not worry, this same Aunt Clara (the former director of the museum at Wachsenburg Castle, Wachsenburg, is located north-west of Holzhausen), who also witnessed another story related to the German missile program and allegedly witnessed the launch of the intercontinental missile " A10 "from the German test site" Rudisleben-2 ", located also in the same area of Arnstadt. I have already described this story in detail, and anyone interested can find it here and read it separately.

Also, let me remind the reader that all the work on the project of the atomic bomb, the German "military" physicist, Dr. Dibner (and his group), is well known to profile researchers and studied in detail after the war, British and American intelligence, which connected a team of German physicists, to work on his own, atomic bomb within the framework of Operation Epsilon.

Indeed, Dr. Kurt Dibner, acquainted with the theoretical work of the physicist Guderly (and not the mythical Schumann from Karlsch's book), was very close to realizing the idea of launching the chain reaction mechanism. Calculations showed that if it is possible to reach temperature values of 4 million degrees and a pressure of 250 million atmospheres, conditions for the onset of a chain reaction will be created. Theoretical, calculated conditions were quite achievable, using an ordinary bomb, 1-1.5 meters in diameter. Work on the "chain reaction" tasked the group of Dr. Trinx (and again not the mythical Schumann). He set to work, undermining carriers from the "heavy" paraffin, with ordinary TNT checkers - in general, the course of thought was correct.

Today we know, this is how a thermonuclear fuze works, but then, a brutal saving of radioactive material led to negative results of the experiment. Postwar calculations have shown, put Dr. Trinx, in a checker, a little more radioactive material, he would have succeeded, and God knows what would be the outcome of the war. Anyway, the German nuclear program froze on the fact that scientists, and did not find a way to cause a chain reaction. In detail, I described the progress of the work of Dibner's group, and the place where it happened, is in this article.

However, where did the conversations about the "Hitler's bomb" come from, you ask? Now, we'll put everything in order. In 1992, British Broadcasting Company BBC, released another series of television films "horizons". The series was called "Hitler Atomic Bomb". In the fascinating television hodge-podge of the early 90's, consisting mainly of scattered interviews of various visionaries and wild speculations, the author of the idea and the presenter, Mark Walker (MarkWalker) led the viewer to the sensational fact - a bomb, Hitler still did! The idea of making money on historical speculation did not give Mark a rest, and now, in 2001, he produces a sensational book "Nazi Science: Fiction, Truth and the German Atomic Bomb" (NaziScience: Myth, Truth, And the German Atomic Bomb). After that ... it began!

After the publication of Mr. Walker's book, local prints, provincial southern Germany, bored by sensation, from someone's filing (and I rightly assume that as part of the advertising of M. Walker's book), slowly began to frighten and surprise the local population mythical achievements of German nuclear scientists. The oil was added to the fire by TV men from the channel "ZDF", which showed in the frame of two enthusiasts with dosimeters broadcasting the audience about the terrible radioactive contamination of the area in the Bittstedt area.

In the autumn of 2001, under the pressure of the alarmed locals, the commandant of the Oirdruf military site (the point is that the "atomic explosion site" is formally located in the northeast of the territory of the huge military training ground), Andreas König was forced to with the official presence of a local public committee, to conduct a comprehensive radiation survey of the entire territory of the test site.

The results were specially reported in all local newspapers and were repeatedly quoted by the local radio station "MDR Radio Thüringen". The fact, artificially provoked by mass hysteria, also confirms that immediately after the publication of Karlsh's book, the unrest of the local population began again, and again, a comprehensive examination of the area for radioactive contamination, this time from civilian control services, was carried out.

According to the results of the audit, on February 15, 2006, in a published release, Dr. Gerald Kirchner from the Department of Radiation Protection of the Population denied information about the contamination of the area, citing the fact that the minor "radioactive contaminations" discovered by previous researchers are presumably the result of the stay of Soviet troops (this is a former test site), as well as the properties of minerals and soil, or radioactive fallout from the Chernobyl accident. In any case, a real threat to health, such "pollution" does not carry.

Our information: Reiner Karlsch is one of the motley galaxy of revenge revamists who adore fooling about with "historical" research in the field of the great technological achievements of the Third Reich and the undoubted social advantages of National Socialism. By the way, in his tales, all these great achievements of the Germans - always steal and capture hordes of savage Slavic barbarians, so that, about the great super-technological achievements of the Aryans, no one but himself knows anything. And in this case, the similar outcome is close to the fact that even at the dawn of his graphic career, in 2002, together with Jochen Laufer, he published a "historical work" on the dismantling and withdrawal of industrial equipment in the USSR ("Sowjetische Demontagen in Deutschland 1944-1949). Mr. Karlsch, once again proved - skillfully mixing the truth and lies, you can get a very realistic product. Well, to the last, I will reveal the terrible secret, the same plumber-witness Gerhard Rudagel, is the uncle of the author of the book, Rainer Karlsch on the maternal line.

The author of the film and book mentioned above, an Englishman and a Cambridge graduate, Mark Walker (MarkWalker), also turned out to be a representative of the Nazi revanchists, in a surprising way, almost in details repeated the whole series of books of that Karlsch, starting with the atomic project and before singing all the nails of National Socialism (we continue to follow his "works").

Well, it would seem that everything is clear with speculation, but where did the "concrete place" come from, where the test was allegedly made?

And here, everything is not as tangled as it seems. Let me remind you that Thuringia - the region of Germany, which we are talking about, in the period 1942-1945, was turned into a fortified industrial area where, under constant incinerating bombings of the Union aviation, the Germans made desperate attempts to hide all military and industrial production underground.

Just 3.5 kilometers south-east of the site where the nuclear charge was allegedly detonated (the Drake facility), in the Jonastal valley, an intensive construction of the super-secret underground complex SIII-Siegfried was under way during this period (my article about the object here), the purpose of which is not determined to the end. It was believed that it was there that the scientific center of the German defense industry and Führer's headquarters would be located. Of course, the Allies needed to provide difficulties in the construction of this facility, and it was not only regularly bombed, but photographed in detail.

During one such reconnaissance raid, an American aerial photo reconnaissance aircraft, with a difference of two days, captured the result of a mysterious explosion on the deserted part of the test site. Alas, this is everything around which this legend is built. All the rest is speculation and speculation.

So, the conclusions: There is no official evidence of nuclear tests in this area. Moreover, there is undeniable reason to assume that the German physicists, for a number of reasons, could not come close to developing a trigger (a nuclear detonator).

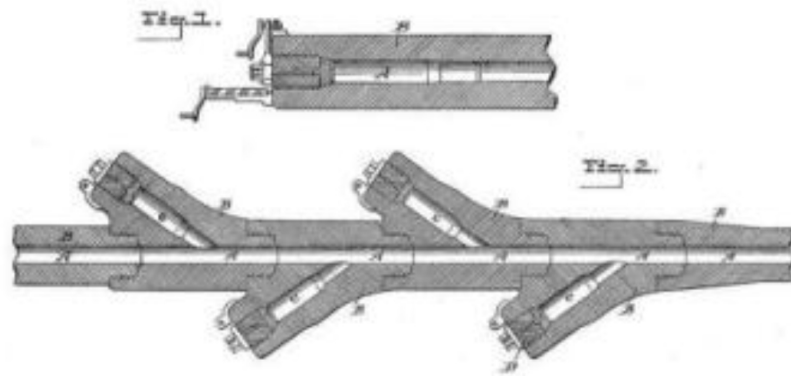

Traces of radioactive materials at the site of the proposed test, also not found. This is confirmed by the two special commissions, as well as by independent surveys of soil samples conducted by us (cosmic search) at Montford University (Great Britain) in 2012.

American strategic intelligence (the forerunner of the CIA), in March 1945, could fall prey to the brilliant (as I believe) scam undertaken by Churchill on the eve of the Yalta conference. According to a number of replicated sources (and I will investigate this topic in detail, within the framework of the Rügen theme), the Prime Minister of England, as a shocking "visual agitation", brought with him a child allegedly stricken with radiation sickness, to the Maltese summit on board the cruiser "Quincy."

Churchill showed the child to US President Truman, with the words that he was allegedly taken from the island of Rügen and he observed a nuclear explosion. After that, the head of intelligence Dulles was urgently summoned to the president, who was showered for oversight, after which, quite naturally, "traces of nuclear explosions" were everywhere here and there. It is not surprising that the same picture taken in early March, with impressive perimeter damage, was adopted for the "nuclear explosion site".

Well, that looks like everything... one more legend collapsed. Well, we are preparing another fascinating expedition for secrets...

Stand of super-guns "V-3" (Vitsko, Poland)

Already, like five months (from the middle of September 1943), in France, near the town of Muak, in an atmosphere of utmost secrecy, the construction of the underground "Object 711" was conducted, which was supposed to contribute to the complete ideological defeat of England ...

A giant airgun, 150 meters long, consisting of 25 trunks of an underground battery, was to bring rain to the London from steel dart shells and inflict heavy destruction on the capital of the United Kingdom, suppressing the ideological resistance of England with terror. As I mentioned at the beginning, the construction of the underground fortress in Muayek was already under way, however, in fact, practical work on the superweapon of the "V-3" was just beginning...

The innovative design of the high-pressure gun proposed by August Künders, the technical one, was far from ideal, and besides, despite the fact that the idea of the unprecedented bombing of London was skillfully presented to the Führer, Hitler liked it very much, serious work was needed to bring these weapons , to the stage of practical application. It is this part of the story about the "Wunderwaffe FAA-3", as a rule, always remains behind the scenes.

So, in fact, simultaneously with the construction of the blockhouse-fortress of the "object 711" in France, a thousand kilometers from this place, on the coast of the Baltic Sea, Todt's construction divisions began to clear the relic dunes near the town of Vetzig (now Witsko).

According to the working documentation, on the shore of the local lake Wetziger (now Polish Witsko wielkie), the "Pumpwerk Misdroy" was built. None of the workers suspected that the strange 130-meter "pipe products" that had been built on the high slopes of the dunes had an "artillery" product code - "LRK 15 F 58".

As it was practiced at that time, under the guise of a pumping station, experimental stands were built, within the project of the future superweapon "V-3" (In fact, the name "Vergeltungswaffe 3", the project was received later, in the autumn of 1943 then, when it was handed over in charge of the SS).

For a reader far from the history of the Wunderwaffe, let me briefly describe the principle of this very innovative product. The high-pressure gun, proposed by August Künders, was a 150 meter long trunk consisting of dozens of identical, prefabricated elements, each of which had two similar "pockets".

An explosive aerosol was injected into the side pockets (chambers), after which a small charge-detonator was blown up under a barrel loaded with a barrel from below, a passive projectile that was a steel needle, 15 cm in diameter and about 2 meters long.

Dart-shell, jumped and began to move in the trunk, where one after another, causing a chain reaction in each of the prefabricated links, the aerosol mixture in the side chambers was undermined. The volume of heated and expanding gas in the giant barrel, accelerated the projectile to a monstrous speed (more than 1000 m / s), on average, three times higher than all reasonable limits achievable by powder charges. Based on the calculations, a dart-projectile fired in such a cunning manner could fly up to 160 km, and this distance was more than enough that from the coast of France, across the English Channel, to shell the center of London. When Hitler was presented with this idea, he was ecstatic, and ordered immediately to begin work on building a battery on the coast of France.

In all this, there was only one problem - no one before, on such a scale, did not create anything like this. The experimental problem was that the flight of the "steel boom" at such speeds and distances proved to be subject to a whole complex of external factors depending on the angle of the barrel's rise to the air temperature or its humidity.

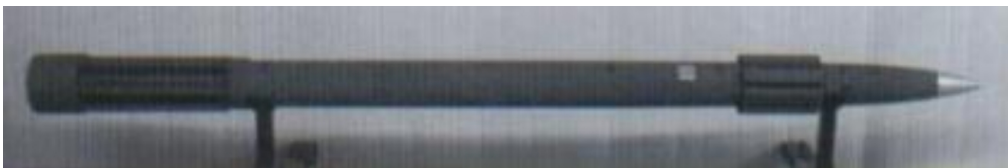

Since the choice of the optimal angle of the barrel was the main problem, for the natural experiments, three stands were built, with different angles of inclination.

In January 1944, the first bench tests of a new miracle weapon began, and by March it became absolutely clear that Kunders had come to a standstill, and a number of serious design flaws clearly prevented the projectile from developing the required speed in the gun barrel (it was required to reach a speed of 1500 m / s, however, during the experiments, it was not possible to overcome the boundary of 1100 m / s).

After a series of meetings, the Arms Command of the Ground Forces (Heereswaffenamt), removes Kunders from the project and takes the initiative, in the hope that after reorganizing the scientific staff, they will "pull out" a super-weapon project, whose existence has been recklessly reported to the Fuhrer. To speed up the project, a number of related specialists were included in the working group, who for two months managed to find flaws in the design of the Kunders gun, and even offered several solutions to the problem.

At the beginning of May 1944, a new design composition, slightly refining the links of the accelerating chambers, made significant changes to the shell itself, which was decided to be produced on the basis of the "Sprenggranate 4481" (97 kg) ammunition. Now, the projectile was equipped with a separate piston and head compensators, which kept the pressure in the barrel during acceleration and separated from the projectile its field of departure from the barrel. By the way, today the same design and principle are used in modern armor-piercing armor shells, which have a "non-standard" form.

Captured ammunition sample.

Museum "Diekirch" in Luxembourg - pay attention to the stabilizers in the bow and the detachable piston on the bottom of the projectile.

Nevertheless, despite all the tricks, the experimental battery, neatly "stacked" the projectiles at a range of 88 km (instead of the calculated 160 km), which began to cause undisguised irritation from the Berlin curators of the project. The orderly adjustment of calls from Berlin began. Apotheosis, was an orderly attempt to bench test, a shot at maximum power. As a result, at the barrel of the air gun, two overclockers severely ripped apart, and the projectile flew only 93 km, flopping to the sea 4.5 km from the shore, on the traverse of Schutzgebiet (now the Polish Sianożęty).

Fortunately, at this time, the American and British aircraft, having discovered the location of the "object 711", densely engaged in its destruction. By the way, during the raids on Muayek, the brother of the future US president, Jim Kennedy, died. However strange it may seem, the destruction of the underground fortress "711" has played into the hands of the army leadership.

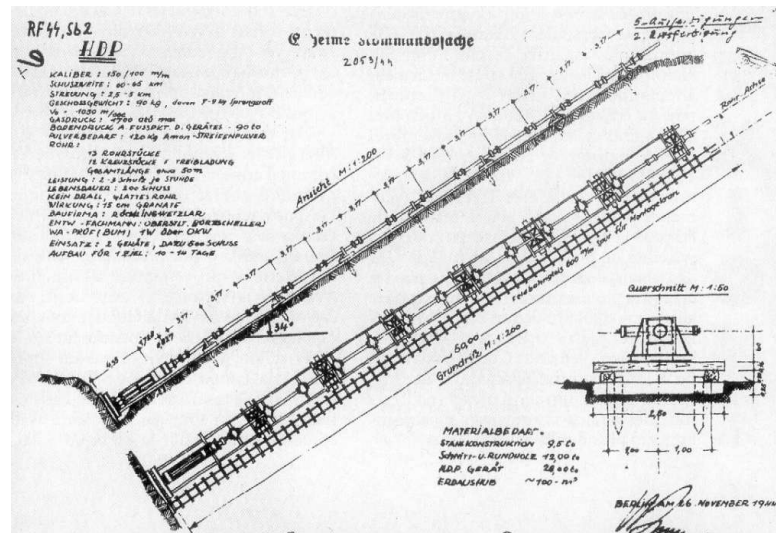

The totality of these events made it possible to justify the "general decision" about the strategic futility of the V-3 project, since the development of practical military use of this type of weapon will require too much time and resources (+ facility 711).

The actual project was buried, however ... The conflict between the staff of the army and the SS, which arose for the right to lead the saving for the spirit of the nation, I believe, was used by the V-2 missile program by the army generals in order to spoil the reputation of the career carpenter from the SS, Obergruppenfuhrer and General of the SS, Hans Kammler (General Dr. Hans Friedrich Karl Franz Kammler). It was to him, as a "brilliant manager and organizer", that a project, which was obviously unpromising in the military plan, was dumped.

He even tried to connect such a completely unwieldy gun to the crazy idea of "total war", creating its combat short version, only 58 meters long (12 links), for at least some practical application, even if not 160 km.

How exactly the attempts of the SS leadership were undertaken, to revive the work on the high-pressure gun, remains unknown, but it was in the fall of 1944 that measures were taken to erect an additional "trunk # 4" at the site. In the same connection, I want to mention that a number of notes and memoirs, participants in those events, indicate frequent business trips to Rewahl (now Polish Rewal), carried out in the after the transition of the project to the hands of the SS. In this regard, it appears that the trunk "No 4", this is the test stand of the shortened, 58-meter version, which, fired from December 30 to January 22, 1944, the city of Luxembourg.

A drawing of the "shortened" variant of the cannon, from which Luxembourg was fired

The introductory information states that two cannons, in a 58-meter version, were transported from a test site and installed in Lampaden, 43 km from the center of Luxembourg, and for a period of 23 days, a total of 183 dart projectiles were fired through the city, of which 44, fell into residential quarters.

By the way, the distance from the launch ramp to Reval is ... do not be surprised at 43 km. In other words, taking as a basis the effective angle of the trunk rise of 34°, at the booth No. 4, we built a shortened version of the cannon and conducted a series of firing, during which it became clear that in this configuration, the projectile flies an average of 43 km. Further, the gun "№4" and a cannon from the stand "Nord" (entirely, it is 130 meters, and for the operation on the western front, only half of it was needed), dismantled and transported to the suburbs of Luxembourg, where we chose a convenient position for transportation in 43 km from the city center (near the railway station Lampaden), collected "products", and began to terrorize the city. Soon, these samples fell into the hands of the "allies".

But the location of the stands in Pomerania was captured by the shock groups of the 2nd Byelorussian Front, May 5, 1945. The further fate of the prototypes, though very vague, but fits into two versions.

On the first, the prototypes dismantled some powerful services (Englishmen, Americans or Russians), and on the sly, dragged them for further work.

On the second, the stands were ripped out and allowed on nails. It is this version, judging by the safety of the remaining equipment in place, the most likely. Judging by the brutal work of the autogen, bent fasteners, they disassembled them, obviously not for the purpose then to collect somewhere. So, most likely they really got into the blast furnace.

A few years ago, one local enthusiast of local history, left the family and settled in an abandoned bunker. Ever since, a small impromptu museum has started functioning there.

The object "Eel" (Tuxeg, Austria)

In 1942, in the camp "Amberg", for the needs of the concern "Messerschmitt AG" (Messerschmitt AG), in an atmosphere of utmost secrecy, the construction of the largest in Europe, supersonic wind tunnel ...

For the needs of secret construction, in the Inn Valley (according to some data, the camp was somewhere in the Haiming area), they organized a labor camp for 1,800 prisoners from the Dachau concentration camp. By rail, the first cargo for the grandiose construction began to be completed, it was planned to finish it in the summer of 1945.

At the end of the war, this part of Austrian territory fell into the zone of the French occupation. A unique structure was dismantled, and as a military trophy, was exported to France. In a number of sources, indirect information is mentioned, that the wind tunnel from the object "eel" is still working in some aviation laboratory in the Pyrenees (according to another version, in the French Alps).

Nevertheless, the traces of the "missing" trophy were quickly found on the scientific object "ONERA" in the town of Avreux in the district of Modan. A unique facility is still considered the largest scientific stand for ultrasonic blowing models, throughout Western Europe. It is known that the object was dismantled and moved to France, the company "Dinglerwerke" (by the way, it exists and now, under a new name - "TLT-Turbo GmbH").

The stand assembled in France

About the device of the object, it is known very little. It was assumed that the super-power turbines were spun by the energy of the water coming through a two-kilometer tunnel carved into the mountain. Under enormous pressure, water was supplied to a hydroturbine from the high-mountain Amberg Lake.

Currently, the state of work and the tunnel itself is not known. Directly on the lake, it was not possible to detect technical objects related to the supply of water to the tunnel (the searches are continuing). A part of the technical galleries in the mountain is available, with a total length of several kilometers. There are surviving objects of the ground infrastructure of the facility. The plans of the object and its underground part have not been published anywhere openly (the study continues).

Object "Heydkraut" (Tuchol, Poland)

Training launches of V-2 / A-4 rockets began here on August 1, 1944, immediately after the deployment of the ground-launched position in the new area. People and equipment, transferred here from the test and training center Heidlager in Blizne, which was hastily evacuated - the secret technique of the Reich, was already directly threatened by the advancing troops of the First Ukrainian Front ...

It is known that from the position near the city of Tuchol, more than 247 launches of V-2 rockets were committed. According to some reports, the testing center had two independent experimental starting battalions.

Coordinates WGS: (53.541226, 18.249321) for the first position and (53.556632, 18.120682) for the second position. Information requires searches on the ground.

Research Area "Pletka" (Leba, Poland)

In August 1942, almost simultaneously with the start of work on the V-4 rocket at the Pamehunde range, the laboratory of the firm (Rheinmetall-Borsig) turned to the command with a tempting offer, in the shortest possible time to create a solid-fueled, multi-stage, operational-tactical missile capable of to deliver preventive blows at relatively large distances for those times, or for the enemy's rear ...

According to the announced project, the missile was supposed to deliver a 100 kilogram warhead to a distance of 100-120 km. The project was approved, and soon work began on the creation of a military prototype under the leadership of the director Klein and Dr. Vuellerse. Simultaneously with the beginning of development, to the dunes, near the city of Leba on the Baltic coast, the construction of a new, highly secret polygon "Pletka" began.

To date, we know of at least 84 launches of the Rheinmetal Borsig Rocket Rh.Z.61 / 9 Rheinbote missiles from the Pletka-Berg test site between the summer of 1943 and January 1945 year.

In November 1944, immediately after the first successful tests, most of the batteries were converted to railway launchers, and transferred to the western front, where from mobile calculations; about 250 rockets were fired at Antwerp. On this, the history of this super-weapon model was completed. In January 1945, under the onslaught of the Allies, part of the self-disintegration, leaving the property to the mercy of fate.

The rocket Rh.Z. 61/9 "Rheinbote" ("The Rhine Racer"), the army designation R.Spr.Gr. 4831, had a four-stage circuit. All stages were equipped with solid fuel engines. The body and supporting structures were made of steel. All stages had stabilizers of different sizes. The total combat mass of the rocket, according to various sources, was 1550-1750 kg, 580-590 kg of which was fuel. The 40-kilogram warhead included 20 kg of explosives; due to the small thickness of the walls of the warhead's body (about 1.5 mm), its action was predominantly high explosive. The firing rate of the launcher is 1 shot per hour.

The total length of the rocket reached 10.8-11.2 meters. To control the launch, a modified V 2 rocket carrier (the so-called "Meilerwagen") was used, the rocket started obliquely, at an angle of 45-65 degrees. After the burning of fuel in the first stage (about a second after the start-up), the second stage engine ignited; the first at this time was separated under the influence of the current of the exhaust gases from the engine of the second stage. The engines of the second and third stages had a similar construction, with a five-second period of operation each. Their separation occurred in a similar way.

After the last missile engine stopped, the fourth stage with a warhead developed at a speed of about 1600-1640 m / s, covering a distance of 220 km in 225 seconds. The possibility of alternately igniting the engines was achieved by using a retarder and an electric timer. However, despite all the excitement, the Rheinbot missile was nothing more than a very expensive toy. The destructive effect of these missiles disappointed everyone, even the biggest pessimists ...

Center for Nuclear Research in Gottow (Germany)

Today, it is an abandoned and forested area, with remains of mysterious reinforced concrete structures, lost in the German outback. And very few people know that it is here that humanity has persistently tried to tame the atom...

ATTENTION! The facility has traces of radioactive contamination, and apparently in the 1980s, attempts were made to deactivate it, however, there are fragments of uranium elements in the ground that create several foci of radioactive contamination.

As a result of a series of intrigues undertaken among German physicists, on October 10, 1942, as director of the physical institute of Kaiser Wilhelm, Heisenberg was appointed, who immediately came under the influence of the leading scientists of Germany's nuclear physics - Wirtz and Weizsacker. Having caught the moment, these "civilian" physicists found a way to exclude from work, "army" physicists in the person of Dr. Dibner, as a result of which, his research team, without any explanation, was transferred from the premises of the Berlin Institute, to the army testing center in Gottow.

The polygon in Gottow was designed to investigate explosives and was excellently equipped with high-class workshops and special boxes for exploring explosives.

Unfortunately, the plans and schemes of the research center have not been preserved, but all the structures of that period are practically accessible for inspection and study, and they are very well preserved. So, the center is a territory with an external perimeter of 2.67 km and an area of 0.4 km², on which two parallel groups of structures are located, located from the east to the west and interconnected by rubbish.

The northern group is a series of eight T-shaped reinforced concrete stands, mainly intended for carrying out experiments with explosives. The dimensions of the main room of the stand are 43x12 m. All eight bench constructions have underground pass-through loss, allowing them to move between them, without leaving the surface. The extreme eastern stand of this group, often issued for the laboratory, is really equipped with a swimming pool, a pumping room and an air intake. In some publications, this place sometimes passes under the code "Viral wing" - in fact, such a statement is mistaken, the "Viral Wing" was the laboratory of another physicist, Karl Wirtz, who was in Berlin and occupied the corps of the Faculty of Biology, where before growing viruses. As for the group of Dibner, which operates on the territory of the center, according to available information, it occupied the last two buildings of the southern group of structures close to the location of the reactor.

The southern group is located 70 meters from the northern line, and it also contains eight buried buildings with a total casualty, which housed workshops and laboratories. The Southern and Northern Group, is also reported by three underground tunnels, which are currently flooded.

Reactor - From the western end of the southern group, there is a reactor building, which is a reinforced concrete basin, with dimensions of 3x3.5 meters, a depth of 3 meters and a wall thickness of 0.4 m. For a long time, among enthusiasts it was believed that the construction of a reactor, where Kurt Dibner, conducted several experiments with a subcritical reactor, was forever lost. In fact, it was simply not found, and in the end the opinion was consolidated that it was allegedly "blown up by the Russians". Luck in this area, waiting for us after declassifying the American documents of the mission "Alsos", they managed to find, the only available photo of the reactor, on which it was possible to unmistakably identify the foundation of the experimental basin.

However, we will return in October 1942, and we will consider in detail the historical significance of this place, in the context of the conquest of the atomic nucleus by mankind. So, having taken the original challenge, the group of Dibner, expelled from Berlin, without notifying Geisenberg, began own experiments in Gottow aimed at creating a nuclear boiler.

The first atomic boiler in Gottow The idea was a logical continuation of the Leipzig experiment, and was that Dibner suggested - alternations of uranium and moderator in three dimensions, probably will be more effective than the layered one (as in the Leipzig experiment). This led to the conclusion that the best form for a uranium element is not a flat plate of a .. -cube! By the way, the idea with the geometric configuration was really brilliant, but all this remains to be confirmed experimentally, and a little later, in the laboratories of Ezau, two other physicists - Pose and Rexser.

So, in Gott's center, for the first boiler, a special reinforced concrete reactor-reactor construction was built, and the company "Bamag-Beguin" made a cylindrical aluminum container in which it was planned to place an experimental nuclear boiler. While the reactor was assembling, a very ingenious method of layer-by-layer laying of paraffin and powdered uranium (uranium oxide) was developed. And, finally, when the work was completed, 6802 uranium cubes, 9.7 cm long, and a total weight of 25 tons, resting in paraffin honeycombs weighing about 4.5 tons, were placed in the boiler. The thickness of the paraffin partitions between the cells was 2 centimeters.

Before assembly, the container was installed in a reinforced concrete pool, and when everything was ready for the beginning of the experiment, the pool was filled with water, which served as a protection and reflector. In the thickness of the reactor, holes were drilled for introducing a source of neutrons and measuring equipment. Alas, the number of neutrons in the reactor did not increase, therefore, the first experiment could be considered conditionally unsuccessful. However, Dibner did not give up.

Only a month after the original expulsion of a group of "army" physicists from the premises of the Berlin Institute, through the Department of Armaments, Heisenberg received the first reports on the work carried out in Gottow, from which it became clear; Diberner is experimenting with the use of paraffin (as a moderator), powder and metal uranium. All three experiments were carried out with boilers in which only the thickness and number of layers differed. As a result, Diberner did not manage to even come close to the results obtained earlier in the Leipzig laboratory.

At the end of November 1943, at the National Bureau of Standards, a three-day secret conference took place, during which a number of reports were read out, including the report of the physicists Pose and Rexer I already mentioned, which confirmed experimentally that the best configuration for uranium elements is cube, and consequently, a group of physicists of Ezau, recommended immediately to begin the serial production of "uranium cubes". Luck was there, too, thanks to the fact that Auer Gesellschaft was able to find a method of phosphating the surface of uranium elements in time, Ezau and Diberner went to the board of Auer Gesellschaft, and agreed on the production of uranium cubes, without reducing the production of uranium plates. The firm went to meet them, and now, Diberner could start preparing the next two experiments with a nuclear boiler, in Gottow, the work again began to boil.

In Gottow brought an aluminum cylindrical container, in which at one time put an experiment on heavy ice, and installed it in a reactor pool. To save paraffin, the container was lined with ordinary wooden slats, and then, at a depth of 160 cm, was poured into paraffin wax. At the bottom of the container, a spherical cavity was made, with a diameter of 102 cm - this was to become a nest for installing the reactor. Reactor collected the actual in just one day.

The experiment was a control, and 106 uranium cubes (254 kg), 4.3 tons of paraffin, were used in it. After a series of control measurements, the Diberner group began the experiment. A radium-beryllium neutron source was introduced into the reactor, 610 kilograms of heavy water was poured into the reactor and the neutron flux intensity was measured. The series of measurements did not take much time, and after their completion, the winch lifted the lid, extracted uranium from the reactor, took several heavy water samples and began preparing for the next experiment.

However, there was an unpleasant hitch, no matter how hard the company "Auer Gesellschaft", by the time they managed to produce only 180 pieces, five-centimeter uranium cubes. However, Diberner did not give up. He had some spare cubes of his own making, made from riveted pieces of plates, by which he planned to compensate for the missing number of elements.

The total amount of uranium in the last experiment reached 564 kilograms, and heavy water 592 kilograms. The neutron source was again placed in the reactor and a control series of measurements was made. After processing the results, Kurt Dibner took heart - the success of the experiment was obvious. At the surface of the reactor, as much as 6% more neutrons were recorded than injected into the reactor using a radium-beryllium source. Of course, such an increase was insignificant, in order to maintain a chain reaction, but the very fact meant a lot.

Inspired by luck, Dibner immediately began planning the next experiment, in which he planned to use six-centimeter cubes of uranium. The planned experience, in the opinion of the scientist, was to give, quite clear ideas about the heavy water reactor and the conditions under which a chain reaction must certainly occur. It would be a real breakthrough.

Unfortunately, the last experiment was not to be realized. Due to the sabotage undertaken by the British intelligence in Norway, the Vemork heavy water plant was destroyed, and this circumstance played a decisive role, Dibner had to hand over to Heisenberg all his heavy water supply, which was necessary for setting up a "big experiment", which was planned to hold in the Berlin bunker of the physical institute in Berlin-Dahlem. In the absence of heavy water supplies, it was necessary to turn off the work with the nuclear boiler, however, before the scientist; another task arose, directly bordering on the creation of nuclear weapons.

What they did not find...

Particular attention, I want to draw the attention of enthusiasts to places that, in the absence of an accurate description, have not been found.

So, having remained without heavy water reserves to continue experiments with a subcritical nuclear boiler, but with a decent supply of uranium elements, Dibner was puzzled by the question of how exactly, it is possible to provoke a chain reaction of the elements. After all, it's one thing to try to launch a sluggish chain reaction in a "nuclear pressure cooker," and quite another, to cause the decomposition of radioactive elements in a fraction of a second (thermonuclear explosion). How to create conditions for such a reaction - humanity only had to find out. Today every schoolboy knows that a modern fuse of a nuclear warhead is a sphere that must simultaneously be undermined from all sides at once, but in order to create this simple technology, scientists of the planet will still have to compete very seriously and solve a number of technological tasks...

An incredible theoretical help in the works of Dibner was a little-known scientific work published in 1936 by physicist Hund. It was dedicated to the behavior of matter at ultrahigh pressures. However, to develop experiments, it was necessary to find out exactly how, it is possible to create conditions for such incredible values of pressure and temperature. A different talented physicist from the Department of Armaments, named Trinx, took on the job of analyzing and developing proposals, to help Dr. Dibner.

He, in turn, seized on another unique work by the physicist Guderly, published in 1942, devoted to ultrahigh temperatures arising in a gas when passing powerful spherical or cylindrical shock waves. Despite the fact that Guderly's theoretical work was cited for ideal gas conditions, Trinx nevertheless undertook to calculate the conditions for achieving shock waves, a volume center with liquefied hydrogen. Calculations showed that if it is possible to reach temperature values of 4 million degrees and a pressure of 250 million atmospheres, conditions for the onset of a chain reaction will be created. Theoretical, calculated conditions were quite achievable, using an ordinary bomb, 1-1.5 meters in diameter.

In April 1943, the Dibner Group, using the stands of the Gott's Center, began the first series of experiments that were aimed at trying to cause a chain reaction, and in the event of a successful outcome of the work, scientists were given a broad perspective of weapon use of the developments made earlier with the nuclear boiler. In other words, they were looking for a way to initiate a chain reaction of fission and thus, to undermine the nuclear charge.

Until the end of the war, a year remained, and in May 1944, about the experiments of Dibner at the Kummersdorf center, briefly and very coldly, Gerlach mentioned, drawing a conclusion about the impracticality of this method.

In experiments, different tin pieces were used, of different diameters and a height of 8 and 10 cm. At the bottom of the checker, a small depression was made, into which a cone was inserted from the deuterium carrier - heavy paraffin. Under the saber, a layer of silver foil was placed, which was supposed to play the role of an indicator of radioactivity.

The first two explosions turned out to be so strong that the test boxes were seriously damaged, and no tracks or scraps of foil were found at all. In subsequent tests, the foil was much better protected, but the study of its scraps revealed no traces of radioactivity, and therefore, the experiment was failed.

Then Trinx developed another experience. He made a silver sphere, 5 cm in diameter, which was filled with liquid hydrogen. Then, the sphere was placed in the thickness of the explosive and undermined simultaneously from several points.

Under the action of ultrahigh pressure, silver was liquefied, and compressed to the center of the sphere at a speed of 2500 m / s. Within a fraction of a second, hydrogen, which could not escape, was pressed on the liquefied walls of the sphere by the temperature and pressure, the same as in the very center of the Sun. A series of such experiments was carried out, however, on scraps of silver foil, no traces of radioactivity could be detected...

Later, already by American scientists, a detailed analysis of the Dibern-Trinx experiments was carried out, which showed that to start a chain reaction, they simply did not have enough "working" material. Take then Trinx, a little more, heavy paraffin, or hydrogen, who knows in whose favor the war would end...

Nevertheless, it is obvious that the experiments described by me were most likely carried out in one of the eight laboratory boxes in the northern sector of the research center. In the absence of specific references, it is not yet possible to pinpoint the exact location. As you can guess, there are no traces of radioactivity, you cannot find it on the spot, but you can concentrate your searches on possible tracks of multiple explosions. Studies continue.

Hitler's Secret Laboratory Koenigsberg 13

The Royal Castle in Kaliningrad on the island of Kneiphof today lies in ruins. There are many legends connected with it, and one of them tells about the secret laboratory "Koenigsberg-13" located here during the Third Reich.

Project of the Fuhrer

In the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries the castle was the residence of the Teutonic Order, and from 1525 became the property of the Duke of Prussia. Under it lay underground tunnels and galleries, which supposedly led to all the ends of the city and even beyond. Their plan was discovered already in our day. According to rumors, it was in the cave under the Royal Castle supposedly housed a mysterious bunker, where secret Nazi experiments were conducted...

If we believe the historian of Kaliningrad Sergei Trifonov, who spent many years investigating this issue, the laboratory that started its work before the Second World War was code-named "Koenigsberg-13", and personally supervised by Gauleiter of East Prussia Erich Koch. It was so secret, that only a few people knew about its existence, including Hitler himself. As is known, the Fuhrer was very interested in various occult questions; he was fond of astrology, magic, hypnosis, various ancient cults.

True, the goal before him posed quite practical: to gain power over the world. For this, a special occult organization, the "Anenerbe", was even created in Germany. Hitler believed that esoteric and spiritual knowledge would help create weapons that could enslave people and influence their psyche. In particular, he relied on oriental mystical teachings. In the hope of finding such weapons Führer even invited Koenigsberg members of the Order of the Tibetan Bon ... Anyway, in 1943 the people met on the city streets of Buddhist monks in red robes and yellow...

What was the laboratory like?

There is evidence that the laboratory had a ground part. The first floors of the four ancient buildings occupied various religious and occult artifacts - masks, icons, weapons. In the basement there were ice baths, and they seemed to store the eyes of domestic animals delivered from meat processing plants. There was also supposedly a department dealing with the magic of voodoo. His staff made puppets depicting the enemies of Germany, and put their eyes in the eye of the animals.

After that, magic rituals began to be performed on puppets, for example, they were pricked with silver needles with amber balls at the ends. They say that the British Prime Minister Churchill was told about this, and in August 1944 he subjected Königsberg to increased bombardment. Nevertheless, the laboratory buildings then survived:

they were destroyed only in 1945, when the city was stormed by Soviet troops.

One of the objects of study in the laboratory, according to the researchers, were ... drafts. They allegedly even tried to use them as weapons. For example, it is said that the staff developed special thin steel feathers, which, if launched through the air in a certain direction, could hit the victims to death, even if they were at a considerable distance.

More people were killed in this way: they were put on a chair, the back of which was studded with holes. If this was repeated several times, a person caught a cold and died of pneumonia, which at that time could not be treated. Indirect evidence of the existence of a laboratory is considered such a case. Once in 1929, Hitler visited Koenigsberg, giving a speech in which were the words: "I came to take this city." Soon the local newspaper published an article by a well-known journalist, deriding the physical and intellectual data of the future Fuhrer, as well as his statements.

The next day a nice young man appeared in the office, who crumbled in compliments to the talented journalist and, as a token of gratitude, presented her with a bouquet of flowers and a chocolate bar. After work, several employees went down to the cafeteria. Among them was the same journalist. Sitting at a table, she unfolded the tile and took a bite. Suddenly there was a crunch of glass. A woman's blood poured out of her mouth, but she continued to bite chocolate like in a trance ... Colleagues hardly took the tiles stuffed with broken glass from her ... After some time a note was thrown at the editorial office: "Give him the city". Those who know about this story are sure that hypnosis took place, and a young man who pretended to be a journalist's fan was someone from the staff of Koenigsberg-13.

The end of "Koenigsberg-13"

After storming the city, strange people began to wander through its ruins with an empty gaze. It seemed like they were homeless, digging in search of food or something valuable. But later the rumor spread that these were special teams sent to destroy the tracks of a secret laboratory.

One of them shot a Russian soldier who tried to smash the SS with a sledgehammer on the old helmet. When the soldiers grabbed the gunman, under his shirt were tattooed ancient Tibetan hieroglyphics and runes. According to legend, during the interrogation of "zombies" he split and told about the affairs of the laboratory where he served.

And what happened to the laboratory archives? One version says that they were taken out of Koenigsberg, and later the Soviet government gave them to the Americans in exchange for German trophy machines. According to another version, all documentation was hidden by state security agencies.

There is a third: before leaving the castle, the laboratory workers flooded the cellars, where documents were stored. Was there a laboratory? Officially, its existence is not confirmed by anything, and researchers draw conclusions on the basis of disparate information, possibly not connected in any way. Although, given the actual interest of Hitler and the Nazi bonzes to the secret sciences, such a laboratory could well have existed. And it is quite possible that it is in the ancient city of Koenigsberg...

It is not known what the discoveries born in the laboratory could lead to. But even now in the modern Kaliningrad there are strange events. For example, in 2005, the NATO spy plane AWACS flew three times around the Kaliningrad region. On the same day, lightning struck the mermaid of the Cathedral, and the main clock of the city stopped. Are these events related to each other?

In 2004, a high-ranking delegation arrived from Germany. During the ceremony of laying flowers to the Eternal Fire, the wind rose. And for the first time in history, the Eternal Fire went out!

The inhabitants of Kaliningrad repeatedly reported that they met ghosts of German soldiers in the streets of the city. Perhaps all this is the consequences of the tests conducted at the Koenigsberg-13 laboratory.

The island of Rügen and its secrets

The island of Rügen is an ominous place, sung by Pushkin himself, he is also the island of Buyan. Why ominous? On its territory for several centuries, scientists and local residents have observed various anomalous phenomena. What are they related to? It is necessary to understand.

The arms race and the role of the island of Rügen in it

As you know, Germany and America since the thirties of the last century are fighting in the arms industry. The "arms race", such a name received the scientific rivalry of these powers in the last century. But why should these, and already powerful powers, fight for the military superiority?

As you know, Hitler was a fan of the theory of the superiority of the Aryan race over the rest of the races, so he sought to bring Germany to the forefront in the field of military equipment and weapons in general. Proving this is the inviolability of the German nation and its traditions. In the thirties of the last century, he deployed a large-scale company to modernize the country's military potential and spent huge sums of money on scientific developments in this field.

But how did Hitler decide to make his power the leader in armament among the other powers? As is known, Germany for many years was looking for a method of creating alternative weapons, equal in power could not be found anywhere else in the world. This should have been something unexplored, untested, so that competitors could not for many years create an analogue of this weapon.

In order to test new scientific developments in the armament industry, Germany used remote from the mainland part of the territory. These were scientific and military training grounds, one of which was the island of Rügen. Since the beginning of the thirties of the last century, dozens of German military bases were stationed on its territory at different times, each of which had its own scientific task.

Scientific experiments on the island of Rügen

It should be noted that all scientific experiments conducted by Germany - were kept in strict secrecy. This was logical, since industrial espionage flourished already in those years. The rivals in the arms race tried in every possible way to find out what the scientific research institutes in Germany are actually doing.

Until now, most of the developments of that time remain a mystery. Only one thing is known - after an extraordinary experiment the island has changed significantly. With a huge part of it, all signs of life have disappeared, the buildings have been shattered. But what led to such large-scale consequences? A series of explosions, attacks from the air? No - this is just one explosion, which caused such large-scale cataclysms.

According to unofficial reports, we are talking about Germany's military experiment on the island of Rügen in the early thirties of the last century. As eyewitnesses describe - in the depths of the island there was an explosion and a fire column appeared in the sky, which later acquired the shape of a fungus. The radius of the explosion was several kilometers. After the shock wave swept through the territory of the island, under its influence, buildings were destroyed, animals and plants were burned to the ground, although eyewitnesses did not observe the fire.

Similar descriptions are typical of nuclear explosions. Among other things, those who were within a radius of a dozen kilometers from the epicenter of the explosion felt a sudden malaise. They bleed, pressure rose sharply, and complaints of body aches and vomiting were also received. All pointed to the chemical poisoning to which the inhabitants of the island were subjected.

The most terrible thing was that after the explosion, the victims were not helped as affected by nuclear weapons, but provided symptomatic assistance. Because in those years to talk about atomic weapons scientists did not see the point, because even in the laboratory they could not yet split the atom.

Today, scientists who have studied the scanty reports of the same explosion on the island of Rügen come to the conclusion that this was Hitler's first conscious attempt to create a powerful and all-threatening weapon. The only thing that German scientists pointed out indignantly was the insignificant radius of the explosion. According to the idea of the Germans, he had to cover a radius of several dozen, or even hundreds of kilometers. Such a large-scale effect the Germans failed to achieve at once. The reason for this could be the active surveillance of US special services for the military activities of Germany.

Already in those years it became clear that Hitler was preparing for a large-scale attack on his opponent. But none of the neighboring countries of Germany could imagine that it would be dragged into the world war, which will begin precisely the aggressor Adolf Hitler. Although the country has always had developed patriotic and social values, suddenly it was on the verge of a grand opening in the arms industry. Something was clearly wrong here. And the intelligence of the USSR and America, suspecting the maturing world conflict, began to more actively conduct their research in the nuclear energy industry, to study the experience in this industry of other states.

It is worth noting that after that incident on the island of Rügen, Germany no longer conducted any tests with the atom. The island was almost completely abandoned. Today, scientists, studying its ecosystem, come to the conclusion that the mutation of the genes of plants and animals on its territory does not cease to this day. What does it say? This confirms the hypothesis of scientists about a possible atomic explosion on the island. But, what surprises scientists in the fact that there was an atomic explosion here?

They are surprised that Germany could overtake America in atomic engineering for a decade. But why, after the experiment on the island of Rügen, Germany has not tried out its atomic weapons anywhere else? Perhaps this is just a prejudice, and in fact the experiments were conducted under the label "secret". Today, there are no exact data confirming this hypothesis among scientists. We can only guess how the course of the Second World War would end if Germany started using atomic weapons in it. Then the atom could not be called "peaceful."

Object "Schlier" (Zipf, Austria)

In October 1943, Allied aviation struck Neustadt, causing serious damage to the Rakswerk plant, jeopardizing the implementation of the German FAU-2 missile program...

Before the leaders of the missile program, the problem of transferring part of the missile production was put in a safe place. The curator of the missile program, SS General Hans Kammler, decided to use the deep beer cellars of the famous Austrian brewery Zipf (beer, by the way, is still produced today) for the transfer of production.

To develop the necessary production facilities in an urgent order, they instructed the well-known engineering department of Fiebinger (Ingenieurbüro Fiebinger). In an emergency order, the production project was ready by the middle of October, and in the area of the former brewery, the first "working camps" appeared, to which a total of 1900 people were soon expelled (expelled from Mauthausen on 30.09.1943, French, Italians, Poles, Spaniards and prisoners of war from the USSR) from the concentration camp of Mauthausen.

The works on the site focused on expanding and strengthening the existing system of underground tunnels of the brewery, punching new tunnels, as well as drilling a 40-meter elevator shaft at the top of the mountain, erecting a bunker of a transformer station and a test bunker for test annealing of FAU-2 rocket engines. The second stage included the installation of the test center equipment and underground production of liquid oxygen (the RellaX facility). The object was planned to be launched in early 1944.

The bunker of the transformer station, where there was an 80-ton transformer, necessary for the production of liquid oxygen. Seven powerful compressors, hidden in the underground part of the complex, produced up to 75 tons of liquid oxygen per day, which is necessary for the operation of the test stand of FAU-2 missile engines.

The construction of a test stands, where simultaneously could "burn" two rocket engines. The essence of the test was reduced to a 60-second engine start at full traction power, which allowed testing the combustion chamber, injectors and turbo pump fuel supply. The structure is 13 meters high; it has two "windows" with stands for fixing the engine and a fuel supply system from the underground station. The jet flowed into the well of the gas reflector, 9 meters deep, and came out to the surface 25 meters from the hopper. Now, this object is located in the protected area of the brewery.

So the object looked in the early summer of 1944. There are no precise plans for the underground part, however, based on the results of the preliminary expedition trip, the front of the works and the list of equipment necessary for penetrating the underground part of the facility were compiled.

Nevertheless, we will return in 1944 year ... Smooth work on the object did not happen. Three cases of explosions of liquid oxygen are known: in February (February 28, 1944, 14 people were killed), a test engine explosion at the stand, in August (August 28, 1944), in 1944, 24 people were killed, including Ilze Oberth the daughter of the chief engineer Hermann Obert. The next day, on August 29, another explosion was blown up, as a result of which 25 engineers of the test center were completely burnt in the fire. All those who died were solemnly buried in the Vöcklabruck-Schöndorf cemetery, after which the works at the center of Rlyah were rolled up and moved to other places.

However, the most interesting thing is just beginning - at the very end of the war, another story happened on the site ... 13.04.1944, the object "Schlier" is secretly inhabited by 142 people from the "team of Bernard" (Kommando Bernhard), the secret unit recruited from high-quality specialists in the field of lithography, engraving, chemistry and photography, all of them prisoners of the Sachsenhausen camp, placed at the disposal of Sturmbannfuhrer Bernhard Kruger.

Here, in deep tunnels, the "Bernard team" for almost a year turned to print counterfeit dollars and pounds, documents, forms, certificates and passports for covering up German military intelligence. Before the evacuation of the "Bernard team", on 03.05.1945 a part of the boxes with blank documents and counterfeit money were burned and buried in the forest near the facility (all the places have not been found yet). The rest of the money and forms, together with the cases of the "VI F4" of the General Directorate of Imperial Security, were packed in 80 watertight boxes, and flooded on the infamous Lake Toplitzsee.

It is noteworthy that the first false notes of pounds sterling, unsuspecting local residents, began to be dragged into the bank to exchange for stamps already at the beginning of July. And by the beginning of June, local fishermen from the lake Toplitz also began to do the same. Hence, there is a fair assumption that flights for the export and flooding of forms, archives and banknotes from the object "Schlier" were quite a lot, since counterfeit bills were caught by packs not only from Lake Toplitz, but also from the surrounding small lakes.

This could mean that the boxes were much more than eighty. But the role of local residents is determined by the assumption that they probably found "stocks" of banknotes not destroyed in the fire, in caches somewhere near the object "Schlier". In search, they had plenty of time.

After the surrender of Germany, the facility remained abandoned for a whole month until the advance units of the 80th Infantry Division and the 3rd US Army reached the site for a whole month, after which, in the framework of the Hermes program, US technical intelligence specialists began to actively operate the facility, hunting for the remains of the technical equipment of the facility, which is related to the missile program of Germany. Fake banknotes were of little interest to them, at least, there is nowhere to be mentioned any special investigations on this topic.

Top Secrets and Mysteries of Hitler

This part includes several articles on the secret workings of Nazi Germany. Also, there is information about the miracle weapons of Hitler and the secret operations of Anenerbe.

The Third Reich (as Nazis called Germany between 1933 and 1945) was considered a strong power, driven by the power of progress. In these years, the ruling place in the country was occupied by Adolf Hitler. It was under his totalitarian leadership that industry, communications, and other branches of the national economy of the Third Reich began to flourish.

Where did Germany draw its knowledge? For scientists this remains a mystery and a serious matter.

U-977, U-530, Antarctica and UFO

About the Nazi bases in Antarctica often write pretty amazing things. Sometimes it's hard to get rid of the thought that behind all this there is nothing but the speculations of the yellow press. I tried to sort this out a bit. Rarely, whoever writes about German Antarctica, does not mention U-977 and U-530, who ended the war in Argentina. U-530 surrendered to the Argentine on July 10, 1945, U-977 - on August 17. Immediately after that, reports appeared in the press that U-977 had transported Hitler to Argentina. As for U-530, in general, they write that it took either Hitler's ashes or some of his things to Antarctica...

Here it is written that in July 1945, the U-977 sank the Brazilian cruiser Bahia with a torpedo, and this fact was concealed by Brazil, Argentina, the United States and Britain.

Captain U-977 Heinz Schaeffer categorically denies this as well as the assumption of transportation of high ranks of the III Reich. During the interrogations, a difference in the weather data in the logbook U-977 with the weather that was the area of the Bahia drowning was found out. But why, in fact, did the light converge with the wedge on U-977? To date, it is still unknown the fate of at least 55 German submarines, so that the torpedo in the Brazilian cruiser was to whom. Some of them could be flooded and crews could get on rubber boats to German bases in Chile and Argentina. Some could get to Antarctica. The problem is that July-August in the Southern Hemisphere is winter and it's very difficult to get to Queen Maud Land at this time of year on a submarine because of the pack ice.

Almost everyone who writes about the Germans in Antarctica mentions a note for Captain U-530, authored by Scheffer: "Dear Willy, I was thinking about whether to publish your manuscript concerning the U-530. All three boats "U-977", "U-530" and "U-465"), who participated in that operation, are now sleeping peacefully on the bottom of the Atlantic. Maybe it's better not to wake them? Think about it, old comrade! Think about that too, in what light will my book appear after what you told us? We all took an oath to keep a secret, we did not do anything wrong and only carried out orders, but our beloved Germany, for its survival, so think again: maybe it's better to imagine everything as fiction, what will you achieve when you tell the truth about our mission? And who will suffer because of your revelations? Think about it!.. "This note is dated June 1, 1983. A tyke here, Heinz Schaeffer died in 1979. Alas, and ah. This note was invented by yellow journalists, just to undermine the credibility of his memoirs.

Here is what Scheffer himself writes:

People refused to believe that the Führer was dead and secretly waited for him to return from his unknown Elbe. The truly disturbing side of all these sensational stories that emerged from Buenos Aires or Montevideo was that their authors albeit unintentionally, wanted to create a dangerous myth that could serve as a pretext for the Germans to just sit and wait. I could not imagine anything more harmful for Germany, and for the whole of Europe, than such vague reflections on the desired. God helps those who help themselves, and not those who wait for the ghost to return from the grave in order to carry out their work. This is the main reason that prompted me to publish the truth about the journey of my ship, U-977. Cry from the heart. But I must say that there are a lot of Germans in South America.

For example, 6% of the population of Paraguay today speaks German, while the white population there is 9%. In 1945, the German Mennonite community there was added refugees from defeated Germany. They asked the Paraguayan government for autonomy in some uninhabited territory.

Paraguayan government, rather rustling bills, allocated them a desert in the Chaco region, where even an Indian cannot survive, not that white (the temperature reaches 50 ° C). However, these fascist monsters conducted irrigation, planted herbs, bred cows and now control 100% of the Paraguayan exports of dairy products. Not relying very much on local justice (it is paid there), the Germans live by their own laws (mainly by the SS statute) and have their own German schools (private). The most successful ethnic group in Paraguay are the Germans (unlike the winners in the USVM, Britain and Russia, where such a group is the Jews).

Generalissimo Alfredo Stroessner (himself a half Bavarian) used many German military as advisers. The Israelites looked at it through their fingers in exchange for the 100 per cent pro-American foreign policy of Paraguay. Today, many Paraguayans recall Stroessner's rule nostalgically; the standard of living was higher then (I must say that Stroessner regularly held elections, which he always won).

In Argentina, the area of land owned by the Germans is equal to the area of Bavaria. Heinz Schaeffer also died in Argentina. Quite a few Germans in Chile (most of the stories about the German Antarctica come from the Chilean diplomat Miguel Serrano, if anyone does not know).

There is another phrase, said by Karl Doenitz in 1943: "The German submarine fleet is proud to have created an impregnable fortress for the Führer at the other end of the world."

In 1938 the German expedition declared Germany's right to part of Queen Maud Land. The entire surveyed territory was named New Swabia and became part of the Reich territory. After the expedition, its leader, Captain Ritscher, reported to Field Marshal Goering: "Every 25 kilometers our airplanes dropped pennants; we covered an area of about 8.6 million square meters, of which 350,000 square meters were photographed." These pennants should be there and today under the snow, unless someone has conducted a communal work on their cleaning. I, however, did not see the reports of the finds of German pennants. The German application was not recognized by anybody, but it could give a purely legal basis for asserting that the Third Reich exists today in the borders of New Swabia.

It is also written that the German base "New Berlin" or "Base 211" was built in Antarctica. Since 1939, the systematic development of New Swabia began. Once every three months, a research vessel Schwabenland flew to Antarctica. For several years, mining equipment and other equipment were transported to Antarctica, including railroad tracks, trolleys and huge tunnels for tunneling. In this regard, the "Fuehrer convoy" is sometimes mentioned from either 8 or 35 huge cargo submarines, which were not used for anything else. During the WWII, for the supply of submarines in the Atlantic, the Germans used the cargo submarines "Milchkuh" ("Milking") so that cargo submarines existed. The first appeared in 1916.

Here is a list of submarines of the III Reich. There are gaps in it, which are explained by the fact that some of the boats were not launched, and the fact that there is no reliable information about them.

To operate the base in Antarctica without electricity, you cannot do. Regular and strong winds blow in Antarctica, but for a counterattack underground base, windmills are not suitable. If they did not find oil or coal there, they would have to transport fuel there from the "big earth". But oil and coal in Antarctica seems to be just many. They also write about Kohler's "converters" (some device for converting the energy of gravity into electrical and vice versa). If there is electricity, it is not difficult to imagine a base with underground greenhouses, although it is doubtful - I have not heard of any works in Germany on underground food cultivation. With mushrooms and fish, suppose everything is relatively simple. But then there was no hydroponics. Is that sea kale and other edible algae as a source of vitamins. Eskimos, however, supply themselves with food in such a climate, even without any technique. The version of the Antarctic Nazi base looks rather fantastic, but, taking into account the history of the Paraguayan Germans, it no longer seems impossible.

In the Russian film "The Third Reich, the UFO Operation," we talk about a battle in the Antarctic waters between the American squadron of Admiral R. Byrd (Operation Highjump) and flying saucers in 1946, after which the Americans had to leave home after losing a destroyer and several combat aircraft. According to official data, only 1 seaplane was lost during this expedition due to bad weather. In the same film, a version is being put forward about relocating a plant for the production of flying saucers with staff to the New Berlin. Against this version, the main objection is that "possess a Nazi such a weapon; they would have already taken revenge." To this you can answer that against the hydrogen bomb and with the plates you will not do much. In addition, such plates can also be from someone else who is against the outcome of the conflict in favor of, say, Antarctica.

I can say it's not bragging that I know the principle of creating the lift, used in the "flying saucer". Hint for those who work in closed KB: the larger the size of the plate, the less the requirements for the strength of the material. Part of the propulsor is an MHD generator. To hang over the ground, it does not practically need to consume the onboard energy :). Anyone who thinks that I'm fooling people here with brains is very mistaken. The principle of operation is simple, like turnip, but it requires strong materials and rather advanced technologies. He (the principle of work) is absolutely within the framework of Newtonian physics.

There are rumors of explosions of hydrogen bombs in Antarctica in the 50's. Personally, for me, it is not important whether this base was (a) destroyed by hydrogen bombs, (b) was abandoned, (c) did not exist at all, or (d) is still in effect. The lack of official information about some things makes any of the 4 options possible. No one seems to attack the Antarctic scientific stations. It is much more interesting to build such a base today. Especially considering that I know how to build this very Kohler converter, i.e. get an unlimited source of electricity without any wind turbines and burning fuel.

Secret transport operations of submariners of the Third Reich

On the combat operations of the submarine fleet of the Third Reich, dozens of books and hundreds of articles have been written. But much more modest is the list of printed works devoted to transport, which was carried out with the help of German submarines. Meanwhile, for example, they delivered Zeiss optics, instruments, weapons and German specialists to Japan. However, the transportation of such goods was not limited to ...

Uranium supplies

In Japan, even before the outbreak of the war in the Pacific Ocean in December 1941, work was carried out with uranium-235, but for full-fledged experiments, its reserves were not enough. In 1943, a request was sent from Tokyo to Berlin for the allocation of two tons of uranium ore. At the end of the same year, one ton of this raw material was taken aboard a certain German submarine. However, she did not reach the destination.

The number and fate of this submarine are unknown until now. In all likelihood, it lies somewhere on the ocean floor. Until recently, it was believed that Nazi Germany in the Land of the Rising Sun did not send more uranium. But it turned out that this is not so ...

When Hitler realized that the war against the USSR and the Western allies of Stalin was lost, he began to rely on any kind of "secret weapon". The Germans obviously did not have time to create an atomic bomb. Perhaps, it was believed in Berlin, it will be possible to do this to the Japanese if they are helped.

And on March 25, 1945 under cover of night U-234 submarine, loaded with half-tonne enriched uranium-235, imperceptibly leaves Kiel. In addition to the uranium, the submarine was carrying a jet Me-262 in disassembled form and details of the V-2 rockets. The target of the campaign was known only by two people on the ship - commander-captain-lieutenant Johann-Heinrich Fehler and second officer Karl-Ernst Pfaff.

U-234 was still on the road when Nazi Germany suffered the final collapse. Gross-Admiral Karl Doenitz gives orders to all German submarines at sea to surrender. Nevertheless, the U-234 continued to follow its route across the Atlantic. The commander successfully evaded the American and British anti-submarine forces, but soon realized that the PL could not reach Japan before. Fehler gathered his officers and asked the only question: what to do? Unanimously, a decision is made to stop the campaign and capitulate.

May 14, 1945 U-234 appeared on the radar screen of American destroyers. At a speed of 14 knots, the submarine approached the ships of the US Navy...

Operation "Tierra del Fuego"

Even before 1944, the operation "Tierra del Fuego" began. Under cover of darkness on the piers of North German bases surrounded by SS men, special commissioners of the Main Directorate of the Imperial Security Service (RSHA) controlled the loading of sealed boxes into submarines. They were placed in torpedo compartments and mined. If in the ocean there was a danger of capturing submarines, this secret cargo would be blown up along with the torpedoes. In this emergency case, there was the strictest order, and the crew of the submarines included Nazi fanatics from the SS special squads, which could be relied upon: they would prefer to go to the bottom rather than be captured.

The boxes on the submarines were filled with currency, gold, and jewels. In South America during the operation "Fiery land" the Hitlerites managed to transfer the truly gigantic wealth that the Spanish conquistadors had never dreamed of. In addition to Argentina alone, 2511 kg of gold, 87 kg of platinum, 4638 carats of diamonds were delivered. What did it all go down to? There is currently no answer to this question.

The secret of the U-534 submarine

Only relatively recently it became known that during the Second World War there was a top-secret combination of German submarines, known as the "Convoy of the Fuhrer". It included 35 submarines.

At the end of 1944, torpedoes and other weapons were removed from submarines included in the "Foyrer's Convoy" in Kiel, since they were strictly forbidden to engage in combat during the voyage. The crews of submarines were selected exclusively unmarried sailors, who also did not survive a single close relative. According to the dictates of

Hitler and Dönitz, the commanders of the submarine must demand that each subordinate give a "vow of eternal silence."

On the submarines from the "Fuehrer's Convoy" they loaded containers with valuables and documents, huge supplies of provisions. In addition, the submarines took aboard the mysterious passengers.

The commander of one of these submarines U-977 Heinz Schaeffer was taken prisoner. At numerous interrogations, conducted by representatives of American and British special services, he never gave out significant information about the submarines of the "Fuehrer's Convoy". The book of memoirs he wrote in 1952 also did not contain anything sensational. But the fact that Schaeffer knew some secret confirms his letter addressed to the "old comrade" captain zurze (captain 1st rank) Wilhelm Bernhart, dated June 1, 1983: "... What will you achieve when you tell the truth about what was our mission? And who will suffer because of your revelations? Think about it!

Of course, you do not intend to do it simply because of money. I repeat once more: let the truth be sleeping with our submarines on the ocean floor. This is my opinion ... "

Were there any words in the letter about the "treasures of the Reich" or about something else? It seemed that the answer to this question will be obtained after the discovery of the U-534 submarine at the bottom of the Danish straits. Back in 1986-1987, all the world's newspapers published material on this sensational discovery of Oge Jensen, a Dane professionally engaged in searches for sunken ships. It was he who tracked down the German submarine.

U-534, released from Kiel on May 5, 1945, transported, according to the media, a solid part of the gold reserve of the Third Reich, secret German archives and about forty prominent Nazis. The commander of the U-534, Herbert Nollau, was ordered to take a course on Latin America. However, the thousands of sea mines delivered by the allies along the coast of Germany and the Nordic countries did not allow the submarine to go at night or underwater. The submarines attacked English aircraft near the island of Anholt, where it sank at a depth of 60 meters. But 47 crew members managed to escape. They later told us about the U-534 cargo.

But the submarine's rise was dragging on. In 1993, they talked about it again in connection with the project "U-534", developed by specialists of the Dutch company "Smith co." One of its leaders Vardlo, giving an interview to journalists in July 1993, said that in the near future work will begin on lifting the submarine. "We talked to each of the nineteen surviving crew members," said Vardlo, "Unfortunately, everyone who was initiated into the" secret of the cargo "and knew about the exact route of the submarine died long ago, and it is possible that on board nothing was special."

Another 14 years passed, and the U-534 was never raised. Why? It is likely that there are still people, with what is influential, to which the appearance of U-534 on the surface is not very desirable.

Another "WunderWaffe" of Hitler

At all times, states embraced by imperial ambitions carried out the development of a universal, literally magical weapon that allows them to conquer their neighbors and easily destroy their living force and equipment. The Nazi Germany was the next to follow this path.

The Wunderwaffe is a miracle weapon. And this concept included not only technical developments, which differed both in their uniqueness and in their complete illiteracy, but also mystical, beyond the forces unknown to them.

Very often, in order to check out the frankly delusional theories, the really important programs for Germany were curtailed. On the development of the most fantastic projects took an incredible amount of time, was spent huge amounts of the budget. But, as one of the former Nazi marshals wrote in his memoirs: "The creators of weapons in great Germany did not lack funds."

In 1957, at the scientific center of the United States, Daytona, home to the American hydrogen bomb, a temperature of one million degrees was obtained during the course of the research. Such a significant experience was conducted by a certain Heinz Fisher. Until 1945, Dr. Fisher worked for the benefit of Nazi Germany. On the questions of journalists about his past, he answered the following: "The Nazis forced me to participate in stupid projects and prevented me from doing the real thing." What are the projects Heinz Fischer called so humiliating? First of all, the doctor had in mind his journey to the island of Rügen.

In April 1942, the situation on the German fronts left much to be desired. It seemed that in such a difficult time, all the forces of German scientists and designers should be aimed at developing simple but effective weapons. But the course of thought of the Nazi leaders turned out to be unpredictable for German scientists. On the personal orders of the Führer, the best radar specialists with Heinz Fischer, led by the most modern infrared radars, went to the island of Rügen, located in the Baltic Sea. At that time, such devices were a technical novelty, but when preparing the expedition they were taken away even from the front edge of the defense, where this technique was vital. After the members of the expedition landed on the island and installed the equipment, Dr. Fischer personally sent all the radars into the sky at an angle of 45 degrees. Several days passed in inactivity. The radar still looked into the gray Baltic sky. A week later, Fisher annoyedly announced that the research was over, and it was time to return home.

And only after the war, in 1946, thanks to the articles of astronomer Gerard Cooper, the background of the mysterious expedition became clear. Cooper wrote the following: "Many representatives of the German fleet and aviation believed in the theory of hollow Earth. We thought, in particular, that it would be useful for discovering the English fleet, because the concave curvature of the Earth would allow us to make observations at very great distances with the help of infrared rays having less curvature than the visible rays. " Simply put, some senior Nazi leaders, including the Führer, have long believed sincerely that the Earth ... no, thank God, is not flat, but it's a kind of bubble formed inside a giant rock. That is, we do not live on the surface of the Earth, but inside it, and if supersensitive radars are raised to the sky, then in reality their rays will tilt to the ground and will be able to "get" those enemy objects that are supposedly located beyond the horizon ...

Heinz Fischer spent a week trying to prove to the government of his country all the known truths.

So it is or not, it is not known, but the expedition to the island of Rügen was indeed, and its meaning is still incomprehensible. (you cannot stupidly trust stories about the war of those who waved their hands after the war).

Some samples of miracle weapons even managed to crawl out of their creators' laboratories. When the war was drawing to a close, a new offspring of precocious engineers appeared on the secret range of the Hitlerites, called "Meerteufel" - "The Sea Devil." The machine was intended for disembarkation of saboteurs in the rear of the enemy. It was an amazing hybrid of a tank and a small submarine, a 14-meter cigar standing on short caterpillars. According to the idea of the creators, "Meerteufel" had to go down to sea with its own motion, stealthily, approach the enemy coast under the water, crawl out to land and land saboteurs. The helplessness of another miracle weapon appeared at the very first stage: the heavy machine got bogged down in the coastal ground and could not get to the water. Further tests were found to be untenable.

Of course, it's silly to say that most of the developments of German engineers of that time did not make sense. Rather, on the contrary, many of them were successfully used in the further development of technical progress. (for example, the installation of night vision sights on tanks by the fascists began even before the war). But in this case, the example of Nazi Germany clearly shows that in such serious issues as war, it is necessary to show at least a minimum of technical literacy and certainly should not rely on esoteric teachings or on crazy inventors alone.

Search for the amber treasures of Rode

One of the greatest mysteries of history is connected with the name of the Nazi scientist Alfred Rode - the loss of the famous Amber Room. In the 30-40 years of the last century, this man was well known in Germany. Alfred Rode, as a scientist and curator of the art collections of the Royal Castle of Königsberg, assembled a unique collection of works from amber. It included jewelry, paintings, crucifixes, sculptural portraits. It was Rode who insisted that during the war the Amber Room was removed from the territory of the USSR.

When the Soviet troops entered Königsberg, all the halls of the museum in the castle were empty - all the exhibits so guarded by Alfred Rode disappeared. For more than 70 years, the mystery of the disappearance of the largest collection of amber has stirred the minds of all researchers and scientists of the world.

In the Königsberg Royal Castle, Alfred Rode served for many years. He became famous as the keeper of an unprecedented collection of amber, and the disappearance of him and the entire collection immortalized his name.

German scientist and art historian A. Rode, wrote books about artists, described exhibits of the Royal Museum, and was the creator of an unprecedented museum of world art. According to Hitler's idea, the exhibits of the museum were to be confiscated and exported from the occupied countries of works of art. Krakow and Koenigsberg cities became trans-shipment points for temporary storage of valuables. A. Rode led the work on receiving, marking, distributing the received values. The depositories of the Koenigsberg castle housed valuables taken from Russia, Byelorussia and Ukraine.

Rode used all his influence to bring the Amber Room to his museum in December 1941. The amber room was assembled in one of the halls of the Royal Castle, but not completely, the room allocated for this was smaller in size than the St. Petersburg palace and some of the panels were stored in the storerooms. The Royal Castle was bombed several times by British aviation, and in 1944, survived a great fire. Rode reported to the command that the Amber Room was partially damaged in the fire. In order not to endanger the valuable exhibit, the Amber Room was urgently dismantled, packed in boxes and placed in different parts of a large castle. There is a version that the boxes with the Amber room were lowered into the mine "Anna", the entrance to which was closed with an explosion. Until now, the shafts of this mine have not been able to be inspected.

Mystical coincidences and riddles associated with the unique collection of products from amber began in April 1945. It turned out that in no archives there are documents associated with plans to move these values. Although reports on Alfred Rode's numerous trips have been preserved, none of the documents mention the search for a place to hide valuables in case of a city falls. Perhaps because of the rapid advance of Soviet troops, the export of collections became impossible. Rode himself did not leave Koenigsberg after the arrival of the Soviet troops, he sent his family to Germany in advance, but he himself remained. Perhaps something held him back, or maybe he was left to look after the hidden values?

No one showed interest to Rod himself. Immediately after the capture of the city, the Royal Castle was inspected. In the first days after the surrender of Koenigsberg by the Germans, the ruined city was plundered. According to the participants of those events, in the survey of the Royal Castle, not museum specialists participated, but the trophy teams that exported all the found values: from tools, machine tools to art objects, they did not care. Alfred Rode continued to keep the secret of hidden collections. Time passed. Mysterious deaths began to take people who are related to the missing art from the Konigsberg Palace.

In December 1945, the investigative department of SMERSH received a report about the loss of the Rode couple. The neighbor asserted that three people came to them, and they took Rode, presumably, to the hospital. The hospital already had a certificate of death and even an extract, where it is indicated in which place of the cemetery "Louise" is the burial. For several hours, ten German prisoners of war hollowed out the frozen ground of the Rode grave, but it turned out that the tomb was false. Thus, someone very quickly removed a dangerous witness who knew the location of the Royal Castle collections.

It is known that several years after the liberation of Koenigsberg from the Nazis in the city acted conspiratorial organization "Werwolf." One of its main tasks is the continuation of the operation to export stolen goods in many European countries. There is evidence that the scientist was destroyed by the Werwolf fighters, and Obersturmbannfuhrer SS Gustav Georg Whist supervised this operation. It was he who was instructed to take the Amber Room from the territory occupied by the Soviet troops. Many years later they found the son of this officer living in West Germany. According to him, his father suddenly died under strange circumstances right after he completed the assignment in East Prussia.

The enigmatic death of the manager and housekeeper of the estate of the former Gauleiter of East Prussia Erich Koch is also connected with the missing values of Königsberg. They knew that at the end of 1944 underground works were carried out on the grounds of the estate and that, perhaps, there were hidden great values. The prisoners of war who participated in the construction were shot. Entrance to the dungeons, in consequence, was found. It turned out that the underground passages from the estate were connected with the dungeons of Königsberg.

According to a submariner expert, there is a whole city near Königsberg. There is even an aircraft factory, which was kept by the Nazis. From the city dungeons several times tried to pump out the water, but to no avail. Studies have shown that the Königsberg underground tunnels are connected with the Baltic Sea. A few years ago, two amateur search engines managed to find an artificial grotto on the coast. The entrance to it was mined. The guys tried to find a specialist who could clear the entrance. But soon both guys were killed: one fell from the balcony of the fifth floor, and the second disappeared without a trace.

The chain of mysterious deaths, related to the search for the Amber Room, continued. In November 1988, an active researcher of the mystery of the disappearance of the Amber Room, the German scientist George Stein wrote to his friend that he had attacked the track of the Amber Room. Soon the body of a scientist with stab wounds was found near Hamburg in the ruins of an ancient castle. The mystery of the Amber Room was never solved, but the scientist's archive was preserved. And it mentions the polygon "Olga" and "the values of Erich Koch", among which, most likely, was the Amber Room. The documents indicate that all these treasures departed from East Prussia in January 1945 on the Emden military ship.

The path of values Georg Stein traced to Weimar. Georg Stein had documents confirming the numerous trips of trucks of the Swiss Red Cross between Weimar and the testing ground "Olga" after the capture of the city by Soviet troops. There were witnesses who saw huge boxes in the trucks' bodies. This operation traces the participation not only of Werwolf's employees, but also of Western allies, as well as of the brother of the Swiss president, Benois Mouzi, who died shortly after the operation under unknown circumstances.

Another mysterious moment associated with the polygon "Olga". On April 19, 1945, the test site "Olga" is inspected by Eisenhower. He visited a prisoner of war camp and a repository of works of art located there. It is not known whether there were valuables at that time or not. When the Americans left the polygon "Olga" they left no scrap of documents. At one time, the Soviet government appealed to the American side with a request to divulge the documents of the division that liberated the range from the fascists. But there was no answer.

The mystery of the missing valuables, including the Amber Room, is still strictly preserved, and all those who tried to approach the solution were killed under strange circumstances. Due to numerous deaths, the problem of searching for the Amber Room and other values taken out by the Germans from Europe has become mystical.

We can assume that there are powerful forces that carefully guard this secret, because the value of stolen values is fabulous. Perhaps the treasure, in time, and will appear somewhere in foreign auctions.

New old version of Hitler's disappearance

The Soviet squadron, which tried to pursue the Fuhrer, attacked a UFO. President of the Academy of Geopolitical Problems, former head of the Main Directorate of International Military Cooperation of the Defense Ministry, Colonel-General Leonid IVASHOV wrote the book "The Overtrope World." It was based on documents from the archives of the KGB and the Ministry of Defense of the USSR.

Each of them is a real sensation. The content of secret folders is so contrary to official history that the book is afraid to even comment. The above facts are more like fiction than reports of intelligence. At the same time, Leonid Grigorievich only documented the versions considered to be conspiracy theories.

Secret documents from the archives of special services came to Leonid Ivashov in the early 90's.

"After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the liberal democrats were seized with a fierce passion to sell the entire Soviet legacy, including state secrets," says Leonid Grigoryevich. - At one of those moments, friends from the KGB called me and asked for an urgent meeting. They told us that a group of people came to them with the order of Boris Yeltsin to put them in the archive and issue materials on the list. Among the first in the list are the results of the 1926-1929 expedition to Tibet by Yakov Blumkin. At the same time, another group appeared in the Research Institute of the KGB of the USSR "Rhombus" - the Soviet analogue of Anenerbe, a society for the study of ancient German history and the heritage of ancestors. In general, the guests wanted to wipe out all our research in the field of mysticism and esotericism.

Honest Chekists then still remained, and today they too are. We with them during the night, this collection was taken out of the archive and hidden in an ordinary garage. Part of these documents I used in the book.

It later emerged that this group represented a closed Jewish Masonic organization called "B'nai-Brit," whose headquarters, by decision of Mikhail Gorbachev, was allocated a building in the southwest of Moscow. The permission to loot the archives was lobbied by Yeltsin's adviser, General Dmitry Volkogonov.

According to Ivashov, interest in Yakov Blumkin is not accidental. This person, who is considered a genius, the founder of the Cheka and almost a devil in the flesh, turned out to be the key to the innermost secrets of mankind.

- Blumkin was included in the Great Soviet Encyclopedia as an outstanding scout. All his official biography is a complete lie, Ivashov is sure. - They write that he visited a resident in five countries in two years. This is impossible in principle. This Jewish boy, the son of a shoemaker, was a Left SR, who was trained as an insurgent for one of three thousand Jewish detachments. Working, Yasha was in the field of vision of Leon Trotsky, who in 1918 identified him in a special department of the OGPU, engaged in the search for ways to control the mass consciousness. That is why, when a delegation from Tibet and Lama came to Russia, offered Felix Dzerzhinsky to send a delegation to them to get acquainted with the secrets of humanity, Blumkin went.

Tibet saw in Soviet power an ally, because it rejected religion. Perhaps this circumstance played a major role in attempts to establish friendly relations.

Blumkin really showed a lot there. But Yasha is Yasha. Returning to Moscow, he got in touch with the German resident Werner von Stillke and for $ 2.5 million transferred the collected archive. Blumkin did not say that he gave practically everything. Therefore, the Germans believed that most remained in Moscow, and they received only a small part of the documents.

Yakov Gershevich got caught in a domestic crime.. Having received such money, he decided to go to Latin America and invited his mistress, the daughter of the Odessa money-lender, Margarita Polezhayeva, also an employee of the OGPU. About his level as a scout speaks the fact that he showed her a suitcase of money and gave a pack of dollars to buy updates. Margarita was detained the same day when trying to exchange and immediately went to Blumkin.

The book contains a fragment of his interrogation.

Question: What characteristics of the weapons you found in Tibet you gave to the Germans? What is this weapon, where did you see it? What is the method of its operation?

- I was taken to underground cemeteries and showed some of the so-called artifacts - weapons of the gods, preserved on the Earth from 15 - 20 thousand years before our era. These weapons are stored in separate halls. The characteristics of the weapon are approximately the following:

1. Gigantic forceps - "Vajar". With their help, precious metals are melted. If the gold is melted at the surface temperature of the sun, then gold flashes for 70 seconds and turns into a powder. This powder was used in the construction of mobile huge stone platforms. If this powder was poured onto the platform, then its weight was lost to a minimum.

2. Bell - the so-called "Shu dzy", with which you can dazzle a large army or an army for a while. The mode of its action consists in the transformation of electromagnetic waves at a certain frequency, which the human ear does not perceive, but shines directly on the brain. This is a very strange weapon. With his help, the Indian prophet Arjuna won great battles, bringing the enemies into a panic.

This weapon remained approximately from 8 to 10 thousand years BC, it was discovered in underground cities under the ice of Antarctica in the area of Queen Maud Land. This place is guarded by guards. They move on special round-shaped aircraft that do not look like airplanes and airplanes, known to us. Technical characteristics of them, I also told Shtilhe.

The missing testicle of Adolf

The Germans very carefully approached the received papers and managed to use the received knowledge.

Based on the reports of Soviet intelligence, Leonid Ivashov argues that in the spring of 1945 Adolf Hitler was not found in Berlin. The Führer disappeared in those very cities beneath the Earth of Queen Maud.

- On the occasion of the 35th anniversary of the Victory, the head of the USSR Armed Forces Museum asked me, as the head of the Defense Ministry secretariat, to ask Dmitry Ustinov to allow the skulls of Eva Braun and Hitler to be placed in the cellars of the museum. I did not see anything unusual in this, and one evening I addressed Dmitry Fedorovich. He paused, lit a cigarette and said: "We will not exhibit. It's not their skulls. " I then wondered why keep someone else's skulls and where are the real ones? The answer was received only by studying the archives in the garage.

From documents it turned out that the report on Hitler's suicide was prepared in a hurry. Our counterintelligence and medics of the Fifth Army, which captured the bunker, made this conclusion without any analysis and thorough examination. They hastened to please Stalin. External intelligence had certain doubts already in June.

Followed the order to conduct an investigation again. It turned out that the main testimony for teeth and jaws was given only by a woman who had come to work as a nurse from a dentist of Hitler. The jaws were rushed to the secret laboratory in Fili, it became clear that it was a fake. Then the senior adjutant of the Fuhrer showed that he and the team were sent to the station area to look for corpses similar to Eva Braun and Hitler. The question was immediately classified and studied seriously.

When examining the corpse of a charred man, he had only one testicle. Immediately the doctor Verner Haase was questioned. He showed that the last time he performed an external inspection of Hitler in March 1945 in connection with the inflammation of the appendages of the right kidney and both testicles were in place.

By that time the reconnaissance was already engaged in deciphering a huge array of captured documents of the Third Reich, and it became clear where the Nazi leader could disappear.

- Back in 1938-1939, our scouts who worked with the Germans, in particular the future academician Savelyev, told us that in Germany they are actively engaged in Blyumkin's papers and even try to attract us to joint research. In particular, Savelyev was told that the very inner cavity of the Earth was discovered, where there are all conditions for life, and that a new Germany is being built there.

Indeed, in January 1939, the Dornier transport ship Schwabia, equipped with two flying boats, explored Antarctica, and in January 1943 at a meeting of the Reich's elite, Grand Admiral Karl Dönitz solemnly declared: "The German submarine fleet is proud to have created on the other side of the world for the Führer is an impregnable fortress. "

What did the Grand Admiral mean by making such a high-flown statement? Especially emphasizing the role of the German submarine fleet, and not transport ships like the "Swabia"?

- Soviet military intelligence in 1945 found out the following, - says Ivashov. - During the war, a group of 150 best submarines, known as the "Special Convoy of the Fuhrer", was created within the German Navy to carry out the "Mission for the Navigation for the Southern Seas". The grouping was functionally divided into submarines delivering cargo and passengers to the Queen Maud Land area and a group of submarines that took cargo and passengers for their delivery to the internal space of the Earth. On June 11, 1945, counterintelligence officers SMERSH in the building of the German Navy's General Staff found pilot depth maps for the captains of the submarines of the second group. The maps were imprinted in the Dachau concentration camp at the "probe laboratory" in January 1944, which testifies to the extreme secrecy of information on the maps and that all persons involved in their manufacture have been destroyed.

The best representatives of the nation

From the report of the Chief of the GRU of September 5, 1945, it follows that in June 1945 a submarine of the German Navy U-530 from a special convoy of the Fuhrer surrendered to the Argentine military, and on August 17 another U-977 submarine returning from the South Pole was discovered by the American squadron, after which the crew of the boat surrendered. According to the report, captains of submarines carried out about 14 raids between 1944 and May 1945, transported 260 passengers and thousands of boxes of secret cargo to Antarctica.

Thus, according to our information, prominent German scientists with their families and "best representatives of the nation" were evacuated from Germany. Captain U-530 Otto Vermouth said that the last time he handed personal belongings to Adolf Hitler and 150 boxes of jewelry. According to other sources, Hitler was on board the U-977 submarine.

"I did not see the late documents, but I believe those researchers who claim that Hitler lived in one of the Latin American countries before his death in 1964," says Leonid Grigoryevich. - Probably not caught on in underground Germany. I asked to go outside. Yuri Drozdov, our scout-illegal immigrant in Latin America, described in his memoirs how he took the oath of allegiance to the Führer somewhere in the early 50's and in his environment clearly emphasized that the Fuehrer is alive.

When it was proved that Hitler fled, a closed decree issued by the Politburo of the Central Committee was issued to seek him in Latin America. Option with underground Berlin in Antarctica, too, worked out. In November 1945, three of our best submarines moved toward Queen Maud Land. Dived and went on the fascist pilotage cards, but the task was not fulfilled. The commander of the detachment was forced to give a command to return, because the boats were attacked by incomprehensible weapons.

It is known that a similar attempt was made by the Americans in 1947. The same route went the powerful squadron of Rear Admiral Richard Byrd and was defeated. Flying saucers sank two destroyers, seriously damaged the aircraft carrier and destroyed several aircraft.

General Ivashov confirms that there is evidence of experts that the Germans were really engaged in the creation of flying saucers and even tried to use them in the Battle of Kursk as a means of monitoring the battlefield, but the project was not successful. Who, then, is the entrance to the underworld protected? Really under the ice of Antarctica remain the remains of ancient civilizations, who took to themselves escaped fascists? That part of the secret archives of the KGB, which was in the hands of Leonid Grigorievich, does not give an answer.

Women-mediums in the service of Nazi Germany

These are rumors, stories of people who have already died, photographs in the reliability of which there is no firm certainty. You cannot check anything, because all the documents we have are only photographs taken secretly from the archives of some special services.

And all this is so implausible that it is more like a myth than a real event. Historians do not dare to touch on this topic, because for them to show interest in Maria Orsic - it means putting an end to their scientific career. And only the most famous researcher of German occultism, Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, decided several years ago to break taboos and devoted a whole chapter to this story in his book "Black Sun. Aryan Cults, Esoteric Nazism and politics of Identity", 2003 (BlackSolence, Aryan cults, esoteric nazism and its political self-determination). But he did it academically as correctly as possible, calling it a myth of modern neo-Nazism.

Well:

Maria Orsic, sometimes referred to as Maria Orschitsch, Maria Orsik, was born in Vienna (Austria). Her father was a Croatian immigrant from Zagreb, and a mother from Vienna. She was a famous medium and became the leader of the Vril Society (Vril Gesellschaft).

Maria was an active participant in the German nationalist movement in Austria, which was active at that time and set out to unite Austria with the German Reich. In 1919, Maria moved to Munich to her boyfriend, who later became her fiancé, but whether they eventually married, or not, is unknown, since both disappeared in 1945.

In Munich, Maria contacted the Thule group, and soon she, along with another girl Traute A. from Munich and several friends, created her inner circle "Alldeutsche Gesellschaft für Metaphysik" (the official name of the "VRIL Society").

That is, according to this myth, the group of Mary Orsik acted as the initiator of the creation of the "Vril Society". According to other sources, Maria Oršić only established her own group within the "Vril Society", but it was the mediums of her group that were the source of the most important information for the "Vril Society".

All of them were young girls who were against fashion for a short haircut. Both Maria and Trout were beautiful girls with very long hair. They wore long hair with a horse-tail haircut, which was very unusual and sexually provocative at the time. This became the hallmark of all women who were members of the Maria Oršić group in the Vril Society. It is well known that the group existed until May 1945.

Women of this group believed that their loose, long hair worked like antennas that accept messages from extraterrestrial beings. But appearing in public places, they gathered their hair in a ponytail. For their own identification, the members of Vril wore a disk with images of two of their strongest mediums: Miriu Oršić and Sigrun. (About Sigrun nothing is known except her name.)

In December 1919 a small group of representatives of the society of Thule and society DHvSS (Lord of the Black Stone) rented a small house in the forest in the vicinity of Berchtesgaden (Germany), where they met together with Maria Orsik and Sigrun. Mary announced that she received a mediumistic message written in secret secret code of the German Templars, which she was unknown. This message contained technical information for the construction of an aircraft coming from the star system of Aldebaran, which were 68 light-years away in the constellation of Taurus.

The surviving documents of the Society of Vril do mention that these telepathic messages came from Aldebaran. Maria Orsich wrote two folders of papers: one in the language, written by the cipher of the Templars, the second in an incomprehensible language. Maria herself believed that the second folder was written in some ancient, oriental language, which she defined as "pan-Babylonian." These reports were addressed by scientists close to the Thule Society: Hugo Winckler, Peter Jensen, Friedrich Delitzsch and others.

They figured out that the mysterious language was in fact the language of the ancient Sumerian civilization that preceded the Ancient Babylon. Sigrun, together with members of the Thule Society, was able to translate messages from this language and decipher strange drawings of a round, flying machine.

Due to financial difficulties, it took about three years before this project of the establishment of flying machines began to be realized. Only in 1922 parts of the machine began to come from different manufacturers. All this was fully paid by the societies of Thule and Vril.

At the end of November 1924, Maria Oršić visited Rudolf Hess in his apartment in Munich together with Rudolf von Sebottendorff (Sebottendorff), the founder of the Thule Society. Sebottendorf wanted to establish contact with Dietrich Eckart, who died a year ago. Eckart was a member of the Thule Society until his death. In order to establish contact with Eckart, Sebottendorf and other members of the Thule Society joined their hands around the table draped with black cloth.

3921373_Vril3 (282x523, 23Kb) Hess fell into a nervous state, watching Mary Orsic's eyes roll backwards, so that only her squirrels were visible, seeing her in a state of trance with an open mouth. However, Sebottendorf only smiled contentedly hearing how Eckart's voice began to sound through the medium. Eckart announced that he had been chosen to have someone deliver an important message in his voice. This someone called himself "Shumi, a resident of a remote world that orbits the star of Aldebaran from the constellation of Taurus."

Hess and Schulte-Strathaus stared at each other in surprise. Shumi explained that they were a humanoid race that colonized the Earth 500 million years ago. The ruins of ancient Larsa, Shurrupak and Nippur in Iraq were built by them. Those of them who survived after the Great Flood of Utnapishti (the Flood of Noah's Ark), became the ancestors of the Aryan race. Sebottendorf was skeptical of these statements and asked for evidence. While Mary was in a trance, she wrote several lines of strange signs. These signs were similar to the language of the ancient Sumerian civilization, the forerunner of the ancient Babylonian culture.

In December 1943, Maria was together with the girl Sigrun at a meeting organized by the society Vril in the seaside resort of Kolberg (Kolberg). The main goal of the meeting was the development of the project "Aldebaran". The mediums of the society of Vril had already received all the exact information necessary for the construction of an aircraft and relatively inhabited planets around Aldebaran by that time. And now they were going to organize a trip there.

This project was discussed again on January 22, 1944 at a meeting of Hitler, Himmler, Schumann (a scientist and a professor at the Technical University in Munich) and Kunkel, a member of the Tule Society. It was decided that the Vril-7 "Jager" could be sent through a timeless channel with a superluminal speed to Aldebaran. In accordance with the testimony of Ratthofer, the first test flight in the timeless dimension occurred at the end of 1944. This test flight nearly ended tragically, because after the flight Vril 7 looked like "as if it had flown hundreds of years". Its interior trim looked very old, worn and had strong fractures in several places.

It is known that the main element of the design of these aircraft was an alloy of red powder, which in the molten state was similar to mercury, but red. If you unleash this "red mercury" at a speed of 7200 rpm, then the disk with this mercury began to screen the gravitational field. During flights through a timeless channel with a superluminal speed, the aircraft could be controlled only by a female pilot, and she needed to be in a state of incessant orgasm. Because only in this state could a person control events, being in a timeless space. The best pilot was Sigrun.

Maria Orsic disappeared with her fiancé and her whole group in 1945. On March 11, 1945, a letter was sent to all members of the society of Tula, which was written by Maria Oršić and ended with the words "niemand bleibt hier" ("no one has stayed"). This was the last testimony of her group and since then no one has heard of Maria and the other members of her circle.

Operation "Six Little Indians"

On October 16, 1946, the chief executioner of the International Military Tribunal, Sergeant of the North American Army John Wood, carried out the death sentence in Nuremberg. Not all holders of the supreme authority of the Third Reich were in the loop.

The execution, which lasted exactly 103 minutes, was avoided by the eleventh convict - Hermann Goering, taking advantage of the ampoule of poison, given on his farewell date by his wife. Martin Bormann, who was sentenced in absentia to hanging, was missing. The main criminal, Hitler, seems to have committed suicide. Following Stalin, Georgy Zhukov expressed doubts about the death of the Fuehrer.

Why the examination of corpses was carried out in a hurry in Berlin, and not carefully in Moscow, with the involvement of the most experienced pathologists, other experts? It is also surprising that neo-Nazis have never tried to find the burial of their sinister idol for many years.

On April 30, 1945, the Nazis allegedly managed to successfully implement the operation to save the Führer, his wife and Bormann. In the operation that received the code name "Six Little Indians", Hitler's twins, Brown and Bormann were used as a distracting factor - according to a pair of doubles per person. The story of how the monsters managed to escape from the iron mites of the Soviet troops deserves attention.

GASOLINE PETROL

According to the memoirs of the generals of the countries of the anti-Hitler coalition present at the execution of Nazi criminals, Joachim von Ribbentrop proved more worthy than others. With his own arm wore a loop from a rope with thirteen knots, he exclaimed: "God save Germany!"

Seeing that his appeal did not make exactly any impression, this former foreign minister and Obergruppenführer SS inquired if he could make a statement? He was given this opportunity. The man whose arms were in the blood in his elbow, said that he did not expect the forgiveness of descendants, and urged the West and the East to immediately stop the strife, to jointly achieve eternal peace throughout the world.

Really, one of the sinister bosses of the Third Reich realized the gravity of the deed? The Soviet historian Valery Miliy, who received access to partially declassified documents of the special library of the Library of Congress, believes that, judging by the protocols of his interrogations, not during the trial, but by the informal, Ribbentrop simply gave his statement a certain conventional sign to the American side, which promised to save life in exchange for extremely important information. Fearing the negative reaction of the world public, the Americans did not keep their word.

But what is the essence of the "information bargaining" of Ribbentrop with the officers of the US special services? Valery Miliy, now living in Canada, says that when he worked with unique archival documents, one of Ribbentrop's phrases burned him like nettles: "Hundreds of liters of gasoline was needed not to burn the bodies of the Fuhrer and Eva, but in order to indecipherably singing the first two twins of the six intended for the sacrificial slaughter. Doubles, permanently residing in Berlin, were killed and burnt to the bone. The fate of four more doubles, living in Munich and Bertsgaden, I do not know. "

Valery Miliy does not doubt that Adolf Hitler and Eva Braun, having escaped the unenviable fate of their "accomplices", spent the days in the "court" of the Bolivian dictator Stroessner. He does not doubt, but denies the fact that he, as the West German newspapers wrote, was a messenger of information, as if on the initiative of Fyhrer Otto Skorzeny's favorite, the operation to organize the escape of Hitler, Brown and Borman from the bunker was called "Six Little Indians". If so, then where is the Negro? It's simple. Burnt bodies are always black.

Two doubles burned. The fate of the other four male and female survivors made a lot of confusion in Hitler's "posthumous" odyssey and his passion.

SIMILARITY IN SOLDIED ITEMS

According to Otto Skorzeny's plan, the most convincing evidence that the Führer and his wife committed suicide was to be provided by Hitler's personal chauffeur. He, Erich Kempka, brilliantly coped with the responsible task, surrendering to prison and telling the investigators of the Allied countries that he had killed the remains for several hours in an aircraft crater. Kempka, moreover, indicated the location of the improvised grave, which is strewn with construction debris, under the window of his office apartment, in the ground part of the bunker.

When the burial was opened, two corpses were found in it - male and female. Identity with Hitler and Brown identified the dentures and even after the traces of long-term surgical interventions. Absolutely unconvincing, at least from the point of view that the prosthetics, the traces of surgical intervention, most likely, "for persuasiveness" produced, as they say, according to the template, so that the twins fully corresponded to those for whom the experts were supposed to accept them.

This "identification" was subjected to pejorative sarcasm by Hitler's personal physician Theodore Morel, who literally said that according to posthumous firebrands, one cannot judge in any way the lifetime origin of carnal originals. Erich Kempka, like a mechanism with a long-running plant, reiterated that he and only he had burned Hitler and Brown, while painting in detail how poured gasoline on the corpses, as a rag torch lit a match from the box Himmler gave him, made two mistakes in a row. The first was that he really did not need matches, for he did not part with a cigarette lighter made from a silvered rifle cartridge donated to him by the Führer. Kempka did not see the faces of those whose corpses were transferred to the funnel for burning. Literally his testimony looks like this: "The chef's face was covered with a soldier's blanket over the bridge of his nose. Eve's face was closed in the same way. Martin Bormann, Eva's worst enemy, explained that faces should not be opened, because we must remember the dead alive. "

TREES FOR SELECTED

Many years after the end of the war, Otto Skorzeny confirmed that the rumors that walked around Berlin that Hitler and some of his associates managed to avoid "a short trial and a speedy execution" are not so groundless as it seems to historians. He, for many years unsuccessfully wanted by agents, confessed to American journalist Max Infeld that he was retiring because he was wanted as a man with a scar, and he did not have a scar on his face, thanks to the virtuosic skill of plastic surgeons. "Such an operation could well have been done by Hitler, and so radical that even the mother would not have known the Fuhrer," Skorzeny confessed with a grin.

Infeld, playing on the self-esteem of the Nazi terrorist number 1, puzzled, asked directly, does not the mention of plastic surgery mean that the Führer escaped from the bunker? Skorzeny with his whole appearance made it clear that no matter how improbable this turn was not presented, it is unwise to write off it. This was indirectly confirmed by the phrase: "The bunker for Reich's supreme person was built with the calculation not only of what could be protected from landmines and aerial bombs, but with the expectation that it could be left through the pipe system. Pipes we called multi-level tunnels, arranged in such a way that only small railcar-cars could run, accommodating every two or three people. "

When asked why the auxiliary bunker is not known even to the authorities of modern Berlin, with a nostalgic note in his voice, Skorzeny said that the heirs know how to keep a secret, and the bunker still corresponds to the original purpose.

Leaving the apartment of the former leader of the Nazi commandos, Infeld considered whether Skorzeny was misleading him, betraying what he subconsciously desires for truth. Meeting with another participant of the operation "Six Negroes" convinced that Skorzeny was sincere.

FLIGHT AFTER THE FEAR

And he was convinced that Scorzeny did not lie, the former military pilot Hans Abert, who was under the Fuhrer's courier and carried out delicate and dangerous tasks.

The last service provided by this ace to the chief was transportation of important persons directly from the Havel River.

About where exactly the passengers "moved" the seaplane, Abert did not spread, advised to talk with the now-alive pilot Kurt Bart. Fortunately, he willingly goes to contacts with historians and journalists.

Bart, hardly Havel asked if his colleague is not mistaken in the date and time of the flight to "deep waters", as well as in the fact that he saved Hitler after the collapse of Nazism, replied, crookedly squinting that it was necessary to talk with American journalist Michael Robertson, not time conversing with the Fuhrer "at Stroessner's court". Infeld thanked and accepted the advice, complaining that Robertson, a CIA agent, was killed in a mysterious car accident, having burned to death with the Russian emigrant Albert Pirnik.

Leaving Barth to eat pizza at the cafe, Infeld again caught himself thinking that, talking with former Nazis, plays in a game they invented according to their rules. A mock meeting in Dresden with a veteran veteran Viktor Abramov, who admitted that on May 10, 1945, in Austria, he glimpsed an impeccable, bare-headed man who reminded him of "someone whom he could not identify for long". This someone was Adolf Hitler, who was carried on a britzke, covered with a sheepskin coat, giving out for a seriously ill person.

Saying goodbye, Abramov suggested that he himself, the other persons involved in the dark, as if the night, history of Hitler, may be, the Nazism's successors try to engage in some diabolical games. Major Abramov, tank officer, also designated the goal of merrymaking - to prove that fascism and its demoniac Fuehrer, without dying, continue to live.

THE WORLD OF SYMMETRY

The fact that the world in which people live is perfectly symmetrical, even philosophers of antiquity have said. They also believed that every person, whether he wants to or not, necessarily has a double. The phenomenon is, being a phenomenon, in fact from a historical point of view, not harmless.

First of all, it is harmful to the fact that even experts, experienced in comparing photographs and photographic negatives, sometimes can not give an unambiguous conclusion, whether the person for whom he issues himself. Similar was noted with elderly women, outwardly as two drops of water similar to Eva Brown. Her "symmetrical copies" in the early seventies of the last century were willingly distributed interviews in Brazil, Argentina, the United States. The interviews abounded with such intriguing facts that even Israeli intelligence agents hunting for war criminals were trapped, unable to firmly determine "Eve is or not Eve."

"If we could prove that Eva Braun is alive, we would have succeeded in attacking the trail of the failed reins of the Third Reich, we would have been able to find out what happened to Hitler or his remains," said Israeli historian Yehudi Blank, who once himself almost did not believe the tales of "another "widow of the Fuhrer, unexpectedly" surfaced "in the fashionable suburb of Los Angeles. The lady, who spoke excellent German, spoke in English with a noticeable accent, was twice subjected to testing on a lie detector. As a result, the reporter for the weekly "News" Paul Drake shocked the readers with a sensational conclusion: "I admit that she swept around the finger sensitive sensors of the electronic device and an army of psychologists, but her appearance is the appearance of Eva Brown, and no one else."

Yehudi Blank does not agree with this "risky" conclusion, mainly because he once happened to contemplate the "photographic gallery" of twins not only of Hitler, but also of Bormann, Goebbels, Mussolini.

Paul Drake, unlike Blank, does not doubt that the obliging young Germans of Germany intentionally brought him to the widow of Hitler, even more convinced of their rightness, when in August 1973, after visiting the mansion of Mrs. Anderson (also Eva Braun), I met there other owners. Mrs. Anderson, her sons, their wives, their children have gone somewhere.

The search for the fugitives gave nothing. In the mailbox of the reporter, they lowered the "strange" note sealed in a tight envelope, advising not to fuss, not to stir up a dangerous past.

JAW IN THE BOX

Unfortunately, unclaimed historians were last year's results of genetic examination, independently and in parallel conducted by scientists from Great Britain, Italy and the United States. The tiny cuts of the bone tissue of the jaws of Hitler, provided by the special guard of the Russian FSB, subjected to analysis, left no doubt that, firstly, women's fabrics, secondly, do not coincide with the genetics of the Fuhrer.

It's time to marvel. How so? Fragments of teeth and jaws, the years lying in a catholic box, were taken from the last secret burial in Magdeburg, which is confirmed by the report of the head of the SMERSH secretariat, captain Ivan Tereschenko, immediately put on the table of JV Stalin.

Having read the document, the Soviet leader wrote on paper: "It is doubtful. Arrange unavailability! "Burial in the garage was flooded with a thick layer of concrete and asphalted. No matter how Western journalists tried to extract information from Tereshchenko about the whereabouts of the grave, he, true to the professional duty of the Chekist, did not utter a single superfluous word, only once having said that he perhaps accepts the uncertainty of the shrewd Stalin.

So, once and for all it is proved that in the courtyard of the imperial office, close to the bunker, the chauffeur Erich Kempka assiduously tried to turn into the ashes of the body not the Fuhrer and Eva Brown, but some outsiders. But if Hitler and his beloved continued to live after the collapse of the Nazi empire, then where to look for their tracks? It seems that in Paraguay, to the German settlements of which the special services of Israel, other countries of the former anti-Hitler coalition, who are leading the trial over the perpetrators of the genocide, are showing increased interest. It is not important that the surviving eyelids of the bloody torturers breathe on incense. It is important that crimes that do not have a statute of limitations are accompanied by punishments without a statute of limitations.

Tibet and the Third Reich

As is known, secret organizations of the Third Reich tried to put themselves into the service of occult practices. Of course, Tibet was also interested in them - the Germans tried to join the secret knowledge of yet another "Swastika people".

The results of German studies in Tibet have been kept secret until now, but some information was still leaked to the press. The Tibetan project of German mystics began in 1922 on the initiative of Karl Haushofer.

Taking advantage of the arrival of several Tibetan lamas to Germany, he tried to learn from them. Haushofer considered it an honor to wear the title of "disciple of the Eastern Mysteries" and claimed that only Tibet could give the new German Reich a mystical power.

Soon Haushofer created the Tibetan society in Berlin. Somewhere around 1926, Tibetan culture and mythology met Adolf Schicklgruber, better known as Hitler. Hitler was captured by the history of this country, but the mysterious Shambhala was especially struck by the imagination of the founder of Nazism, about which the French mystic Rene Guyon wrote:

"After the fall of Atlantis, the Great Teachers (Mahatmas) of the previous civilization, the masters of Knowledge, children of Cosmic Intelligence, moved into a huge system of caves.

There they divided into two "branches": the right and left faith. The first "branch" is "Agarthi" ("The Hidden Center of Goodness"), it deals with contemplation, without interfering in human affairs. The second "branch" is Shambhala ("The Hidden Center of Power"), it controls the elements and human crowds. Mages and warriors, the heads of the peoples of the Earth can, by sacrificing sacrifices, conclude an agreement with Shambhala. "

Of course, to enter into an alliance with cosmic forces is the ultimate dream of any ruler.

So, to establish contact with the mysterious Shambhala, tried first Haushofer, and later Ernst Schaeffer engaged in this. Hereditary orientalist fan, Ernst Schaeffer was born in 1910 in the family of a collector, a collector of Japanese weapons and Chinese porcelain.

The heart of the younger Scheffer, who grew up surrounded by samurai swords and cups painted with dragons, forever belonged to the East. After graduating from high school, Ernst went to the university to study, it would seem, quite a different subject - zoology, but in 1931 he was already in Tibet. Formally, Schaeffer, a member of the Dolan expedition, went to Tibet as a zoologist.

The young man did not betray his interests. No one in the team knew that he was an orientalist, a member of the National Social Democratic Party of Russia and personally acquainted with Heinrich Himmler. The secret patron of Scheffer, the Reichsfuehrer of the SS, is rumored to have instructed the zoologist to find a mysterious Shambhala.

The campaign began in Myanmar and almost ended in China, engulfed in civil war. Many members of the expedition, including Dolan himself, were killed. Scheffer led the remaining and stubbornly advanced. The expedition visited regions that Europeans had never visited before. Soon after returning to Germany, Schaeffer published the book "Mountains, Buddhas and Bears", where he talked about the unthinkable feats of an expedition that overcame mountain ranges, made narrow gorges, and crossed over turbulent rivers.

Travelers visited the sources of the Yellow River and the Yangtze, incidentally eliminating the "white spots" on the map of Tibet. Highlanders from the sky-high villages periodically attacked the white aliens, but they did not go off to drink salt. In general, the expedition was successful: it was possible to collect rare herbaria from plants that are nowhere else in the wild, and to catch a panda bear, little known to European zoologists.

The results of the secret mission of the young scientist remain a mystery until now. It is only known that Himmler was pleased with him. When the institute was founded in 1933, Anenerbe Sheffer was invited to the Institute as a leading researcher.

A new expedition to Tibet Schaeffer organized in 1935. As the research was funded by the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, half of the expedition members were Americans. However, soon after crossing the border of Tibet, Schaeffer provoked a conflict between the American and German groups in order to get rid of unnecessary eyes. The discontented Americans turned back, and the Germans, guided by the directions of Schaeffer, reached the sources of the Yangtze and the Mekong. It is possible that the expedition visited Lhasa.

The results of the second campaign in the mountains of Tibet were no less impressive. The researchers discovered many new, previously unknown to science species of animals and plants. Among them are a dwarf pigeon, an antelope orango, many rare birds. In 1937, based on the materials of the expeditions, Schaeffer published a monograph and defended his thesis.

After gaining fame in the scientific circles of the Reich, he was instructed to head the Tibetan department of the Aeneerbe Institute. The department had something to do, because as a result of expeditions, thousands of ancient Tibetan manuscripts got into the disposal of the SS - a significant part of the great occult heritage of the East ...

On September 10, 1938, the Reichsführer of the SS Heinrich Himmler met with the leadership of the Tibetan department of the Institute Anenerbe. At this meeting, which was held in the office of the head of the SS, the terms, goals and tasks of the new expedition were approved. Officially it was another expedition of naturalists to study the flora and fauna of Tibet. But the expedition included employees of special services of the Reich, radio experts and, of course, scholars of orientalist associated with the SS and Anenerbe.

The unofficial task this time was not advertised, but also did not hide. The Germans wanted to establish a closer contact between the "two swastika cultures" - Nazi and Tibetan.

To do this, the residence of the Dalai Lama in Lhasa was supposed to host a permanently functioning radio station. Serving this installation should have encryptors, engineers and high-end radio operators.

Perhaps, their activities should serve only as a cover: in fact, Germany needed to improve the quality of radio communications with its Far Eastern ally, Japan. To do this, on one of the mountain tops of Tibet, in the zone of strong winds, it was necessary to install an automatic repeater and a wind turbine with a vertical turbine specially developed in the secret laboratories of the SS.

The installation site and the repeater itself had to be mined, technicians should be eliminated, and the approaches to the repeater should be destroyed. There is no direct evidence of the existence of this device, but there are supposedly some documents of British intelligence for 1942, where it is mentioned that a special group has been sent to Tibet to destroy the German long-distance communication transmitter operating there.

The documents contain testimony from the surviving member of this raid, according to which, upon arrival in the Kanchenjungji mountain area, the British stumbled upon the remains of temporary buildings of some German expedition. In some buildings there were personal belongings, and in one the remains of breakfast. It all looked as if the camp had been left in a hurry just recently. To the north-east, to the steep slope of the mountain, there was a well-developed path, which rested itself in a sheer cliff, with a possible secret entrance into the underground cavity.

The British group failed to neutralize German mines, which, after exploding, caused the collapse of rocks in the valley and covered millions of tons of soil with this mysterious place. Almost all members of the group died, why the narrator himself survived, remains a mystery ...

After installing the repeater (if it really existed), the Sheffer expedition visited the capital of Tibet, Lhasa. The regent of Tibet Quotukhtu through Schaeffer gave a personal message to Hitler, in which he wrote:

"Dear Sir (King) Hitler, the ruler of Germany, who dominates vast countries! May health be with you, joy of peace and virtue! Now you are working on the creation of a vast state on a racial basis.

Therefore, the leader of the German Tibetan expedition Sahib Schaeffer, who arrived today, had no difficulties in the way of Tibet, nor in the realization of his goal of establishing personal friendly relations, moreover, we hope for the further expansion of friendly relations between our governments.

Accept, Your Grace, Lord (King) Hitler, our assurances of further friendship in accordance with the words spoken by your side. I confirm this to you! Written on the 18th of the first Tibetan month of the year Earth Bird (1939) ".

Soon after the Regent wrote to Hitler, a radio link was established between Lhasa and Berlin. The regent of Tibet, Quotukhtu, presented Scheffer with presents, which he had to give to the Führer of the German nation: a silver cup with a lid inlaid with precious stones; silk handkerchief and a dog of a special Tibetan breed.

Scheffer enjoyed the hospitality of the regent. Sheffer's report reveals the depth of his enthusiasm before what he saw in the capital of Tibet:

"Monks in scarlet festive attires in unison uttered festive texts. Narrowly low, rumbling voices merged into an unspeakable murmur that seemed to come from the naked womb of Maitreya, the coming Buddha. It was the most grandiose statue on the high altar painted with red lacquer ...

The symphony of colors and smells was echoed by a superbly orchestrated orchestra. The drum was thumping softly, whistling flutes, carved from human bones, the clatter of plates and golden bells crumbled in a March drop. Maitreya, who is here called Champa, was portrayed as a good-natured skinhead fat man.

It was not yet time for him to embody the Buddha's new incarnation to descend from heaven to sinful earth, and with a sad smile he looked at what was happening through fragrant smoke, clutching a traveling bundle in his hand. The time will come, and with a victorious thunder the mountain hiding it will split, and already in the guise of the prince will follow the Tibetan paths, announcing the advent of the era of happiness and justice. "

After studying the rituals of Buddhist monks, Schaeffer found in them much in common with the rituals of the Aryans, which was quite in the spirit of the Nazi "science." And, of course, there was a search for Shambhala. Using medieval maps and based on the works of Blavatsky, the Roerichs and other travelers who were interested in the occult secrets of the East, German orientalist Professor Albert Grünwedel concluded that there is a passage accessible to people in Shambhala near the Kanchenjunga Mountain.

According to rumors, Scheffer's expedition has been there. And supposedly not completely unsuccessful: the Germans did not find the entrance to Shambhala, but they wrote down some mysterious radio programs in an incomprehensible language that were being conducted in a practically unused, then ultrashort wave range. However, since the tapes containing these recordings have either disappeared or are classified, it is impossible to draw any conclusions.

Most of the members of the Tibetan Expedition of Germany returned to the Reich in the summer of 1939. In Schaefer, Germany was honored as a hero, the Reichsführer Heinrich Himmler himself took part in the solemn meeting. Literally on the second day after the arrival of the homeland, the German leadership raised the issue of sending a whole detachment of soldiers and scientists in uniform with a load of military equipment and scientific instruments to Tibet. Only the beginning of the war prevented these plans to establish control over the heart of Asia.

In 1941, Scheffer had occasion to participate in yet another mysterious project called "Lapland."

This time, the action took place not in Tibet, but in Finland. According to rumors, the Germans were interested in the search for Arctida-Hyperborea, the mythological ancestral home of the Europeans.

Details of the project "Lapland" are unknown today, since there are no documents showing the true aims of the Germans.

And in 1943 Schaeffer again began to work on Tibetan subjects. Goebbels, who started the propaganda campaign "Mysterious and Friendly Tibet", needed his knowledge. Soon after the end of the campaign, Schaeffer disappeared. Again was sent to Tibet to restore contact with the mysterious forces dormant under the Himalayas?

Or was it something else? Return to Germany after May 1945, Schaeffer was impossible, especially since they were interested in the special services of the countries-pobsditsnits. The same special services were also interested in Tibetans, many of whom were in the service of the Reich.

Even before Hitler came to power, many Tibetans of religious and secular figures lived in Germany. In some large cities they formed whole communities; especially many of them lived in Munich and Berlin. The mysterious Tibetan society of the "Green Monks" maintained contacts with the "Tula" society.

In Berlin, there lived a Tibetan lama, known for wearing green gloves as a sign of belonging to the "green monks". This man allegedly several times gave an accurate forecast of the results of the elections to the German parliament, foreseeing the role of the National Socialist German Workers Party (NSSDA).

Hitler, interested in the occult, favored the Tibetans, and many of them revolved "at the court" of the Fuhrer. However, during the storming of the Reich capital by Soviet troops, Tibetans from Hitler's circle perished. They did not surrender to captivity, preferring to fall in battle or commit suicide. All their secrets the eastern adherents of Hitler carried with them.

Secret SS weapons

Today, no one disputes the fact that many talented engineers and scientists worked at the Research Institute "Anenerbe", as well as in other secret laboratories in Germany. But what additional materials did they use, with the exception of the latest scientific and technical developments at that time? At least, so put the question historians, experts and even ufologists.

For example, it is known that the Germans found and forwarded to ancient Indian manuscripts "Vimanika Shastra" and "Samarangan Sutradharan", which described a completely unusual technology and samples of technology, which, according to researchers, are of extraterrestrial origin.

If this is to be believed, it turns out that Hitler was helped by the higher forces themselves.

And how else to relate to the detailed description of the huge airspace ship "Shakuna vimanas", reminiscent of its appearance modern space shuttles of reusable use (such as "Shuttle" and "Buran")? As stated, it is able to fly not only within the solar system, but also to the stars. One of the active elements of his propulsion system was mercury or its vapor.

In reference data from the archives of the Third Reich it was said that the "Anenerbe" scientists were able to decipher some ancient occult keys (magic formulas, spells, special rituals) allowing contact with unknown sources (the Germans called them Umami Outer, or Alien).

Modern researchers of biolocation methods know well that women are the best contactees, therefore, women-contactees were assigned to work with "keys" (in particular, the name of Maria Otte is mentioned). The sessions of communication with the Umami Outer were conducted in different cities of Germany in specially equipped and strictly guarded premises, the approach to which, even accidentally, threatened extraneous death.

Repeating exactly the ancient recipes of the call, contactees began to receive information that was recorded on a specially prepared for such a record paper. In particular, this concerned the description and drawings of flying disks, having flight characteristics significantly exceeding the capabilities of German and foreign combat aircraft of that time.

In the declassified archives of the Third Reich, information was also provided on the principles of "twisting of thin physical fields", which make it possible to create technomagic aircraft (LA). From reference data it followed that one of the developers of LA was the famous German scientist Dr. V.Shum. He created an electrodynamic apparatus that uses the rapid rotation of individual elements, resulting in an anti-gravity effect that causes the aircraft to lift into the air. A little later, the design was sent to the city of Augsburg near Munich, where the flight tests continued.

As a result of these and other studies, the technical unit of the secret society "Vril" SS-1 created a whole series of flying disks, outwardly similar to modern UFO-shaped discs. The discs of this series had a diameter of 38 to 68 meters, a fixed cockpit for the crew at the top and a lower platform for airborne weapons, on which an armored gun turret was mounted from tanks "Tiger" or "Panther". A disc-shaped body rotated around the stationary part, driven by several jet engines.

The rotating disk ensured the stability of the apparatus in the air, the horizontal movement was created by a rocket engine with a liquid oxidizer. The lifting force of the apparatus was due to a special anti-gravity block in which mercury rotated in different planes. The documents claimed that the 38-meter disk in three minutes gained altitude of 15 thousand meters and developed in a horizontal flight at this altitude supersonic speed of 2,200 km / h. The disco could fly forward and backward almost without turning, to hover motionless above the ground and to aim fire at ground targets from tank guns.

The next generation of flying disks was the Haunebu series. Some of the ideas and technologies of ancient Indians, as well as "smokeless and flameless engines" of the most prominent Austrian scientist in the field of fluid motion of W. Schauberger, whose operation principle was based on the explosion, were allegedly used in these devices. In the development of the discs of this series, four experimental centers of the SS, which were subordinate to the secret society "Black Sun", took part.

In his book "German flying saucers", the military historian O. Bergman describes the "Haunebu-2" disco-a military hypersonic device with a diameter of 26.3 meters, adapted for flights in outer space with a crew of 9 people (design speed up to 21000 km / h).

American researcher UFO V. Terziysky argued that the further development of this series was a military disco "Haunebu-3", designed to fight air with naval squadrons. It had a gigantic size (diameter 76 m, height 30 m), very powerful artillery armament (4 gun turrets, each with 3 marine guns caliber 270 mm). Terziyski even claims that this disc could go into near-earth orbit and in March 1945 made a flight around the Earth and landed in Japan.

The immediate designers of the combat disco were three German scientists (Shriver, Mitche and Habermol) and one Italian (Belonzo). Their work was completed just before the end of the war. But because of the Soviet offensive, all the samples of the disco were immediately destroyed. Subsequently, Habermol and Mitche fell into Soviet captivity, and Shriver and Schauberger found themselves in the United States. The fate of Belontsov is unknown. It is possible that the work on German combat disco in the postwar period continued in the USSR and in the United States.

They were interested in the Third Reich and directly the phenomenon of UFOs. To study it, at the end of 1942 a special military scientific research division, Sonderbureau-T13, was established in Germany, which carried out research work, code-named Operation Uranus. It is possible that its results were used in the production of combat discs.

Ahead of a decade and a half of Soviet and American designers, German missiles tested at the end of the war an intercontinental ballistic missile FAU-3 ("Weapons of Retribution") for the bombardment of New York and other US cities. In the book "Alternative-3", published overseas, the main data, general drawings and description of the design of the German orbital space station "Andromeda" of huge dimensions (length more than 100 m), similar in appearance to a large airship, are given. According to the book, in 1943 Andromeda, built on a secret plant near Berlin, was put into a near-earth orbit as a single structure with the help of two anti-gravity magnetolectric devices with a mercury working body. In our time such stations are assembled in orbit only in parts.

And here again there are questions, to which there are no unambiguous answers. What is common between the combat discs of the Third Reich, the vimans of the ancient Aryans and Indians and modern UFOs? Was the capture of the UFO crashed by the Germans, which triggered the creation of their own disco?

Some ufologists believe that contact with extraterrestrial civilization from the constellation of the Pleiades took place long before World War II, having had a significant impact on the scientific and technical developments of the Third Reich. Until the end of the war, the Nazi leaders had hoped for direct alien military assistance, but they never received it.

Documentary evidence of development of combat disco in the Third Reich can be considered two archival films. One of them was discovered in the late 1950s among German trophy films. This is a report on the flight tests of a completely unknown combat disco of the FAU-7. The second film was shown relatively recently at a symposium on UFOs, held in Crimea in 1995. It was a three-hour video film "UFO in the Third Reich", re-shot from old archive films, the basis for which was the materials "Anenerbe."

There is another hypothesis that one of the expeditions could detect an injured flying saucer and come into contact with her crew. Most likely, it happened in the Himalayas. Other scenarios are also proposed: the Germans captured the crew of the injured UFO or accidentally discovered a base of aliens who did not expect the intrusion of uninvited guests. According to some researchers, contact with aliens Germans could conclude on mutually beneficial terms, the newcomers were provided with the materials necessary to repair the interstellar ship, and the Nazis in return received previously unavailable knowledge and technology.

As you can see, the space for semi-fantastic and completely surreal versions is unlimited here, especially since in all these stories there is a lot of confusion and confusion.

On the other hand, it is difficult to deny the obvious: in the sphere of the newest technologies and types of weapons, the Germans have significantly outperformed their main opponents. Specialists in military equipment and economics point, for example, that having in the late 1930s only 57 submarines, during the four years of the war, Germany was able to build at its shipyards more than 1100 ultramodern, by the standards, submarines. And this is due to the acute shortage of many materials strategically important for warfare.

It would seem that having the Nazis contact with extraterrestrial intelligence, they could well create more advanced types of weapons such as nuclear submarine cruisers. But we must take into account that the Germans used those technologies that, under the conditions of war and as quickly as possible, the Reich industry could realize. It was unrealistic to create a nuclear submarine fleet in those conditions, despite the fact that Germany was successfully developing such weapons and, fortunately for the allies, simply did not have time to finish the work.

But the Nazis managed to create the first jet fighter, which developed a speed of up to 1000 km / h, significantly superior in speed and armament to any aircraft of all countries of the anti-Hitler coalition. As in 1945, under continuous bombings, the Nazis managed in a few months to release 2,000 new combat vehicles and have time to use them in battles? In addition, Germany has developed a radically new type of aircraft engine, and many Western experts are sure that if the fascists launched their new jet fighter Messerschmitt M-163 in the series at least in the second half of 1944, the course of the whole war could change abruptly due to their full domination in the air.

The military archives of the British Air Force and the United States maintain reports of military pilots who reported that during the flight over Germany they often met strange aircraft similar to British military helmets in modern interpretation. The first to watch a UFO was Captain Sobinsky, a Pole who served in the Polish division of the British Air Force. On March 25, 1942, he made a night flight to the industrial center of Essen on a bomber.

After completing the assignment, when the plane left the airspace over Germany and gained altitude of 5 thousand meters, it began to pursue a silver disk-shaped device. The machine-gun fire did not affect the movement of the vehicle: he continued to fly behind the bomber, not answering the fire. This accompaniment lasted no less than 10 minutes. Then the "thing" flew up in the lightning speed and disappeared into the night sky.

Another reliable case of UFO sightings, information about which was preserved in the archives, occurred in 1943. In his report, the Major of the British Air Force R. Holmes wrote that on October 14 during the bombing of German territories several "brilliant discs" were seen. And they did not react in any way to the fire that was being fired by air bombers from the bombers.

Following the British with mysterious objects collided and American pilots who fought in Europe. References to such cases are in the archives of the US Air Force Intelligence Department, where UFOs appear as fighter fighters. So they were nicknamed the American pilots of the 415th squadron of night interceptors, operating over the territory of Germany in 1944-1945.

In the reports on luminous flying objects, the unpredictability of their behavior was noted: the object could pass through the battle formation of bombers at a high speed without reacting to firing from machine guns, and could simply suddenly disappear during the flight, dissolving in the night sky. In addition, cases of malfunctions and failure in the operation of navigational and radio equipment of bombers in the event of the appearance of unknown aircraft were recorded.

In 1950, the US declassified part of the archives of the CIA, relating to UFOs. It followed that most of the flying objects recorded after the war were trophy samples of the war years, that is, they were the work of human hands. However, these archival data were available only to a very limited number of people and were not widely publicized.

A much greater resonance was received by an article published on March 25, 1950 in the "vyutak sGiana", where the above-mentioned D. Belontso claimed that the glowing UFOs observed during the war were only disc-propelled LAs invented by him, which, in the strictest secrecy, had been developed since 1942 in Italy and Germany. In order to prove his correctness, he presented sketch outlines of some variants of his developments. After a while, the West European press heard a statement by that same German designer R. Shriver, in which he also claimed that in Germany, during the war, secret weapons were developed in the form of flying disks or flying saucers, and he was the creator of some of these devices. .

As you can see, all those who have been engaged and are engaged in collecting reliable information about unusual developments are dealing with rather inconsistent material. In this connection, the question arises: if discs and other devices are the result of technical genius or "gifts" of aliens, then why did not they use the "great conquerors of the world"?

An indirect explanation for this is found in the following circumstances. In fact, the flying saucers had significant structural defects, which prevented them from being used on the battlefields. In May 1945, shortly before the arrival of the Soviet Army, the Skoda plant in Prague was blown up, all the designs and prototypes of the designs were destroyed.

However, one of the developers of the discs by the name of Andreas Epp after the war left for the United States, where, according to rumors, continued to design cars for the CIA needs. This information is indirectly confirmed by the report of the National Institute of Scientific Discoveries of the United States, published in the summer of 2002.

Having analyzed numerous reports of huge triangular black objects that have been repeatedly observed over various areas of the United States since the 1980s, its employees came to the paradoxical conclusion that "UFOs are manufactured in US military plants." According to scientists, mysterious objects are nothing more than "secret vehicles used by the US Armed Forces".

This explains the fact that UFOs are often observed in the vicinity of military bases, and the US Air Force does not even think of attacking them. "Apparently, we are dealing with some variations on the theme of airships, which explains their size and quietness, high payload, speed and range, and the ability to ascend to a height unattainable for ground-based radars," the scientists conclude. They, however, did not manage to explain how the Pentagon managed to hide such an innovative invention from the general public.

In general, when it comes to inhuman plans, imperial ambitions, then in this case, failure is much preferable to any great discoveries. And the words written in the foreword to the second edition of the book "The Nazi tyrant and occult forces" by the historian E. Sabi are true:

"... there is still a battlefield where Good and Evil, Truth and Lie, Christ and Antichrist are fighting for peace. We will still have to suffer to understand the origins of the drama that unfolded before our eyes ... Paganism and brute force were elevated to the rank of religion. This was achieved by Hitler, and it ruined him. Only social justice will open the era of universal brotherhood. Winning is not all. You have to defeat yourself. The world must be governed by moral laws, and then humanity will be saved. "

Afterword

This concludes my brief review of the secret laboratories. In the expanded edition I will introduce you to other interesting objects.

Sincerely, Dick W. Kerry,
